Mr. KEY of Ohio. If that soldier should come home and in the course of two or three years die of some disease not incurred in the course of the service, would not his earning capacity have been reduced?

Mr. RUSSELL. With all due respect, the gentleman's question is not pertinent. We have not yet reached partial-disability cases. If this amendment is accepted, when we do reach partial disabilities I will offer a further amendment affecting partial disabilities; but this is exclusively for total disability.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The question in my mind was, if you accept partial disability for an arm off or for a leg off, where are you going to stop?

Mr. RUSSELL. We will stop when there is no more paying of pensions to soldiers for disabilities. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important amendment, and now that we have had it explained by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] I ask unanimous consent that it be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, my colleague states, of course, an extreme case, one that appeals very strongly for sympathy for that class to which it belongs.

The whole scheme of compensation or pensions, or whatever you may call it, in this bill is based upon the liability of the Government for death or injury in the service. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment entirely different. It is not based on that theory at all. It is tantamount to a claim based upon service alone and not upon disability or injury suffered while in the service, and would be a service pension, just exactly what we have in the existing law, and hence would be a pension, unquestionably, pure and simple, and an entire departure from the theory upon which this bill is drawn.

Under the provisions of this bill if a man is totally disabled he is entitled to compensation. If he dies of this injury or of a disease contracted in the service, the Government undertakes to discharge certain obligations to him by making provision for his dependents. That is as far as the bill goes. Our pension laws enacted during the Civil War and following the Civil War down to June 27, 1890, gave a soldier a pension based upon disability the result of injury suffered in the line of duty, or gave the widow a pension based on his death from such injury in the line of duty. In the event the soldier died, his wife was not entitled to a pension unless she could show that the injury of which he died was of service origin. It was $8 a month for many years. I do not remember when it was changed to $12 a month, but I think in 1910. Hence we say that this is a very important matter.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. It occurs to me, although I have not had an opportunity to examine the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL]—but it occurs to me that the gentleman's amendment cuts out entirely any recovery for a death from injuries in the service in the line of duty. If that is the case, then the only provision there would be in the law if the amendment is adopted would be if the death occurred from something that was acquired after he had been totally disabled.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the intent of the amendment is that, although he may have suffered total disability in the service—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, the time was extended five minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The amendment is drawn on the theory that the widow will be entitled to a pension without any reference to any other evidence than that he served in the Army; without reference to whether his death was the result of injury or total disability of service origin. If he died of smallpox or some other disease and served in the Army, the widow's right to a pension would accrue.

Mr. TOWNER. But this is the thought I had in mind, if the gentleman will follow it out. Perhaps I am not correct. He provides for his death or disability resulting from personal injury. Of course, a person might die from an injury immediately and then it might be from an injury received which would also result in death. If I understood the gentleman's amendment correctly, it would limit any possible recovery in all cases except that for death following an injury where death was occasioned by disease which was acquired subsequent to the injury.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hardly think that would be the result, and I am sure that is not what my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL] intended. But if we are going to embark on a recasting of the bill on the line of service pensions, then, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] suggested, we ought to provide a scale for partial disabilities, and I am sure we do not care to undertake to do that.

My thought is, however, that it is an entire departure from the theory on which the bill is drawn, and it is up to the committee to say whether or not it wishes to charge the Treasury of the United States with allowances as provided in this article 3 to dependents, not alone in the event of death or disability in the service, but death resulting from other causes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. You say this is contrary to the spirit of the bill as drawn. Now, if it is a meritorious amendment, and I believe it is, ought it not to be adopted, notwithstanding the spirit of the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I say that we want to understand just what we are voting on. I think it is contrary to the spirit or theory upon which the bill is drawn, and it ought not to be written in the bill. If we are to have a law based on service, let us have it. This bill is not drawn on that theory.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman from Missouri, the author of the bill, admits, does he not, that if a soldier has lost both legs in battle and has a wife and four children at home, and subsequently he gets well of that but dies of some other disease, he would get no pension at all under this bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not if he dies of some other disease.

Mr. RUSSELL. What difference does it make to the widow and the four children whether he died of his wounds or died of some other disease?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, that is putting it the way that the Committee on Pensions always puts it when they want to appeal to the sympathies of the Congress.

Mr. RUSSELL. He suffers the same total disability and has the same dependent family, and I say that it is inequitable.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Here is another man in the community who may be blind and has a dependent family on his hands. He dies of smallpox, and he does not get anything for his family.

Mr. RUSSELL. But he did not die in the service of his country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, yes; he was a good citizen, and it may be that he was engaged in some hazardous employment; he may have been working in a mill and contracted it there, or in a mine or a stone quarry and been injured by a premature explosion of a charge of dynamite. I hope the time will come when provision will be made for all such cases as that where the family is left in destitution.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, at the outset I wish it understood that I am not opposed to this bill in every particular. There are some features, however, I am opposed to in it. I wish to say a few words with reference to the legislation affecting widows' pensions, and I want to go back to the time of the Civil War. After the Civil War all widows to be entitled to a pension could only receive same if the soldier's death was the result of that service—wounds, injuries, or diseases. All of those widows were pensioned at the rate of $8 a month. Twenty-five years later, in 1890, Congress passed a pension law so as to provide that all widows could receive a pension regardless of whether or not their soldier husbands' death were the result of service. Under the act of June 27, 1890, if a soldier should have been in the service for 90 days and received an honorable discharge, and if the soldier's wife married him prior to the passage of that act and was dependent, this was all that was necessary to give title. That law was in existence with the $8 rate until April 18, 1908. Upon that date Congress merely changed the rate and gave to all widows the rate of $12 a month without regard to service.

Mr. SHERWOOD. That is right.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The widows received the $12 rate, then, until the law which was passed last September—the law coming from the Committee on Invalid Pensions—which gave all widows a $20 rate, provided their husbands died of some disability incident to the service and she had been his wife during any part of his military service, and to all widows who had arrived at their seventieth year, whether or not the soldier's death was the result of his service.

Now, the point I wish to make clear in this case is that the Congress of the United States never gave to any widow a service pension until 25 years after the war was over, and the Spanish War widows are now going on their twentieth year and no service-pension legislation has been provided for them to date. Now, what do we want to do? Are we prepared to throw down the bars and pass a service widow's pension bill at this time for this war? The question is, How far can this Government go? Do we want to pass a service-pension bill? There seems to be a great deal of merit in the case cited by my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], and the case cited by him stands out as exceptional, and if we start in on a case of that kind, where will we land? You let down the bars, establish a service pension pure and simple. There is no demand for a service pension at this time in connection with this war. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, because I believe early and immediate legislation is necessary as embodied in this bill, I propose to vote against any and all amendments unless suggested by the committee. We are wasting pretty valuable time nowadays.

I am in favor of this bill being enacted into law at the very earliest moment. I had hoped when I read the committee's report that any discussion of this measure might be of a more or less perfunctory character. I can not believe that the opposition which has been shown to some features of this proposed insurance for our soldier boys and their sailor comrades will be carried to extremes. Oh, I hope not! The American boy is on his way to the battle front in France, and thousands of our splendid youth are already on foreign soil. I have been specially privileged, Mr. Chairman, to witness the embarkation of a regiment of American soldiers, leaving home and all things dear to them, as they sailed away, many perhaps never to return. I witnessed and shared in a farewell to these 3,000 sons of American mothers on their way to fight our battle and the battle of world democracy on a front 3,000 miles away. As I looked at that regiment, composed of the best and bravest of the youth of an American Commonwealth, I felt a thrill such as no sight had ever sent through my heart. It was an unforgettable thing to see, for one who can catch the vision as those clear-eyed lads have caught it. Not one of those boys waited to take his chance in the national lottery; not one thought of filing a claim for exemption; not one hesitated to go more than half way to meet the call of duty. Happy and proud the mothers who bore such sons—happy and proud even while their mother hearts are wrung as their sons march away to the grim service, and, mayhap, the awful sacrifice of war. Mr. Chairman, the whimper of the slacker and the rant of the agitator are heard here and there in the land, and with them the insidious propaganda spread by those who are secretly the enemies of America, though too cowardly to step out squarely in the open. But how petty, how craven, how unavailing is all that in the face of the spirit that inspired those boys as they marched aboard that transport on a beautiful summer day, not many days ago. Those boys are the true Americans. They have in their keeping all the sacred ideals that the pioneers brought to these shores of freedom; all the sacred ideals that the fathers have bulwarked here in blood and sweat and tears; all that the war-weary world looks to our flag as symbolizing. Our love, our hopes, our faith, and our prayers go with them. May God guide and guard them. [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL]. That amendment as now framed is this, and I ask pardon for repeating it, but it is of such importance that I think it should be impressed upon the mind of each man now voting. As framed it is as follows:

That for death from any cause not the result of his own fault or misconduct, at any time—

Now, mark these words—

after suffering total disability, resulting from personal injury or disease contracted in the course of service in the line of duty or for total disability incurred in such service in the line of duty—

Then the compensation shall follow.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is possible in drawing the amendment it may be defective in that respect, and so I would be glad to have the gentleman offer an amendment to correct it.

Mr. DEWALT. If this amendment as proposed by my learned friend were to carry, in my opinion, it would certainly exclude a man who had been killed in action, because he would not be entitled to compensation for the reason that he had not suffered total disability resulting from personal injury or disease.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to say I entirely agree in what the gentleman says and have just examined the amendment carefully for the purpose of ascertaining that. It certainly will have to be amended, or else it would exclude all those who were killed in action.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think there is any doubt about that, and that is certainly not the intent of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. There was no such intention at all.

Mr. DEWALT. Whilst the case that has been presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] is an extreme one, and no doubt aroused the sympathy of every man who heard it, nevertheless there is one thing that should not be forgotten in the discussion, and that is that we ought to refer to section 308 on page 24 in reference to this very subject. Section 308 provides:

That no compensation shall be payable for death or disability which does not occur prior to or within one year after discharge or resignation from the service, except that where, after a medical examination made pursuant to regulations, at the time of discharge or resignation from the service, or within such reasonable time thereafter, not exceeding one year, as may be allowed by regulations, a certificate has been obtained from the director to the effect that the injured person at the time of his discharge or resignation was suffering from injury likely to result in death or disability, compensation shall be payable for death or disability, whenever occurring, proximately resulting from such injury.

Now, the case as presented by Judge Russell in brief was this: That there were two brothers—one of them killed in action, the other one losing, we will say, both legs. The one returned home and recovered from the injury. The gentleman's statement is this: That the man who is killed in action, and leaving a widow, his widow is entitled to pension; and in the case of a man who goes back home, having lost both legs, and recovers, but subsequently dies, his widow receives nothing. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], however, should not forget that by the provisions of section 308 the party who loses his two legs has the right, and this section 308 gives him the right, of receiving a certificate from the director and medical officer that he will suffer from that injury, and be permanently disabled; and, secondly, that death may result from that injury, and that whenever the death occurs consequent upon that injury it makes no difference whether it be 1 year or 20 years thereafter, his widow would be entitled to compensation under the act.

Mr. RUSSELL. Where he dies from a disease resulting from that wound, but not from any other disease.

Mr. DEWALT. No. Pardon me. Where the party, we will say, in your instance, has lost both legs, he gets from the director, according to the provisions of section 308, a certificate that he is wounded to such a degree that it is likely that death may ensue as a result. Now, he has that certificate in his possession. It makes no difference, according to the provisions of this bill, whether he dies 1 year or 10 years after that. If he has that certificate, his widow would be entitled to the pension, and if disability arises by reason of the injury—of course the disability would have to be consequent upon the loss of his legs—he is entitled to the compensation himself.

Mr. RUSSELL. He is, as long as he lives.

Mr. MADDEN. Ought not section 308 to provide that he "shall be" allowed? This says that he "may be" allowed a certificate. Ought it not to be mandatory?

Mr. DEWALT. I think that would be an improvement. I think it ought to be mandatory upon the authorities to give it to him in a proper case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to meet the objections that have been made to it, by inserting after the word "death," in the first line in my amendment, the words "resulting from injuries received in the service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated, and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by inserting after the word "death," in the first line, the words "resulting from injuries received in the service."

The CHAIRMAN. Is this offered as a substitute for the prior amendment?

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer it in order to correct my amendment, so as to conform to the idea of some of these gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. RUSSELL. Some of them want the amendment read as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 3, 4, and the first part of line 5, on page 17, up to and including "duty," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That for death resulting from injuries received in the service from any cause, not the result of his own fault or misconduct, at any time, after suffering total disability resulting from personal injury or disease contracted in the course of service in the line of duty, or for total disability incurred in such service in the line of duty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, yeas 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, may I ask as to the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] demand tellers? The gentleman from Ohio demands tellers. All in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eleven gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. The Chair would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. The Chair is not sure whether he correctly understood the gentleman from Ohio. Did the gentleman from Ohio demand tellers or did he make the point of no quorum?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I made the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio made the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirteen gentlemen are present, a quorum. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEY of Ohio: On page 17, following line 10, after the word "Provided," insert "It is provided that the adjudication, consideration, and administration of all claims under Article III of this bill shall be, and is hereby, assigned to the Commissioner of Pensions, Bureau of Pensions, and to the Secretary of the Interior Department. It is further provided that all of the benefits of Article III of this bill shall be by the Commissioner of Pensions, by the Bureau of Pensions, and by the Secretary of the Interior Department extended to and embrace all pensioners whose names are now borne on the pension roll or hereafter placed thereon under the general law for wounds, injuries, and diseases or deaths due to service in line of duty in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps: And it is further provided, That nothing in this bill shall be construed so as to reduce the rate of pension now being paid or hereafter to be paid to any pensioner under the general law."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment. It is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, the controlling motive in the consideration of the bill to provide insurance for the enlisted men of the Army and Navy should be to do everything in our power for the soldiers and sailors who are to bear our standards across the seas and so to arrange the bill that the dependents of these men left behind will have every possible assurance of being properly cared for.

In brief, the compelling influence in the pending legislation should be the obligation imposed upon us by virtue of our office to look after the material welfare of the men who are fighting to preserve the rights of our country and also to protect their dependents.

We need have little fear that too much can be done for them. Too much can never be done for the man who is willing to leave all and chance his life and all he holds most dear for his country. Too much can not be done for the wife whom he leaves behind and who is ready to add her sacrifice to that of her husband. Too much can not be done for the dependents, now left without a breadwinner, by the country for which the breadwinner is ready to die.

While expenditures of millions and appropriations perhaps now unexpected may be made, the question is not primarily one of money and can be approached best only from the standpoint of patriotism—from the viewpoint of men conscious of a sacred trust imposed upon them. I shall vote for the bill.

The provisions for sailors and soldiers or their dependents contained in the proposed bill for purposes of study and discussion can be best considered under three headings:

(1) (Article 2) Provision for financial support for the dependents of sailors and soldiers during the war, which we have considered.

(2) (Article 3) Compensation to soldiers and sailors in case of permanent disability—either total or partial disability—or to their dependents in case of death resulting from injuries or sickness incurred during the war.

(3) (Article 4) Optional insurance plan by which the soldier or sailor may obtain additional protection against death or total and permanent disability incurred during the war or after the war at normal mortality rates, the Government to assume the cost of the extra war risk.

Articles 3 and 4 can be modified in a manner which will disburse the funds of the Government to the sailors and soldiers of their dependents in a much more equitable and satisfactory manner.

One purpose which has been advanced for Article IV is that there is a necessity for insuring "loss of insurability" of the men who go to war. Under a properly drawn compensation plan there can be no question of the "loss of insurability" of the men during the term of the war if the compensation plan (article 3) is drawn with liberality. By amplifying the list of possible dependents and making more liberal the payments under the compensation plan (article 3), there can be no question of "loss of insurability." "Loss of insurability" after the war should also be taken care of if the compensation plan is drawn sufficiently liberal. If a soldier or sailor is injured or disabled by sickness sufficiently severe to affect his insurability, he should be eligible for compensation. All men who are not disabled because of the war may obtain standard insurance—there is no "loss of insurability."

To summarize: If the compensation plan, article 3, is amplified by protecting beneficial interests which are not now mentioned, such as parents, grandparents, brothers, and sisters, if wholly dependent, and the monthly benefits be increased to provide more generous protection, it may be a substitute for article 4, as a source of additional protection, and there is no question of "loss of insurability" involved. A compensation act drawn in such a manner will take care of the soldier or sailor or his dependents, if he suffers any injury or other disability which would be severe enough to cause "loss of insurability." To make it more specific, the increase in the monthly benefit, which can be made to take the place of the money which would be expended by the Government under article 4, the following examples are cited:

(1) Let us take the case of a private, wife aged 30 years—no children. Under article 3, in case this man be killed, payment of $35 a month during the life of the widow until her remarriage is payable. For each $1,000, which the Government would disburse under article 4, this monthly allowance would be increased approximately $6. In other words, if, under article 4, the soldier had procured $1,000 of insurance, he would, as a substitute, under article 3, provide for his wife in the event of his death during the war an increase in his compensation of approximately $6 a month. The increase in the wife's monthly income would, of course, be greater in proportion with the increase in the amount of insurance.

(2) Widow, aged 30, children aged 6 and 4. In this case—if the soldier be a private—the minimum monthly compensation under article 3 is $52.50. For each $1,000 of insurance under article 4 the Government could provide $6.25 a month additional benefit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may proceed until I have concluded my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that he may proceed until he has concluded his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONERGAN. (3) Let us take the case of total and permanent disability of a private aged 28. The minimum allowance, excluding nurse benefits under article 3 is $40 per month, to continue during the lifetime of the soldier. For each $1,000 of insurance that he had procured under article 4 the Government could give as a substitute an increase in his monthly benefit of approximately $3.75.

(4) Permanent partial disability. Even if the man had applied for additional insurance under article 4 there would be no additional protection for the many injuries of this nature, for the reason that article 4 provides only for a benefit in event of death or total and permanent disability. A plan for amplifying article 3 would, however, increase the benefit for the numerous injuries of this nature.

It will be indicated therefore that by amplifying article 3—the compensation plan—in the manner suggested as a substitute for the proposed article 4, material additions to the monthly benefits can be made by utilizing the moneys, which would have been expended under article 4, and the much more satisfactory method of compensating these men and their dependents will follow. Most men prefer that the benefits be paid during the lifetime of the soldiers or sailors.

The second purpose of article 4 is undoubtedly to forestall pension legislation. Pension legislation has been of two general classes: First, pensions in event of death or disability in the service; second, service pensions—that is, pension allowances as a reward for certain periods of service. It can be seen that the first class of legislation will be taken care of by a properly amplified and liberalized compensation plan (article 3). Service pensions, however, can not be taken care of by a compensation plan or by an optional insurance plan such as article 4. If the Congress thinks it desirable to attempt to forestall service-pension legislation, the best proposal is to give to each man who enters the service of his country a level amount of insurance. It would be recognized in doing this that this is a gift of the Government to the men for services rendered. Under such a plan a certain amount of insurance—to be fixed by Congress—shall be given to each member of the Army and Navy. This will offer some additional protection, it is true, but mainly the idea will be to give this insurance protection because of service to the country. The present provision of article 4 is inequitable. I can think of no better argument than the point raised by Chairman Adamson in the hearings held by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce during the statement of Mr. A. L. Hereford. I quote Mr. Adamson's remarks on page 74, part 3, of the hearings of August 24, 1917:

The CHAIRMAN. I am not hunting for a pretext on which to defeat the bill, but I am rather hunting for something to base it on. I want to ask you a question. By giving the option to the soldiers of taking insurance, one soldier takes it because he feels able and another soldier does not take it because he does not feel able. They both get killed. The widow of the one who has taken the life insurance gets the insurance and the widow of the soldier who has not taken the life insurance does not get any insurance. Do you not think some benevolent Congressman would immediately introduce a bill for a pension for that widow whose husband was not able to take the life insurance?

On page 49, report of the hearings on the pending bill, August 17, 1917, Capt. Wolfe, the actuary for the Government, is quoted as having said:

Twenty-five per cent of the men the first year will take out $2,500 of insurance. Of course, some will take out only $1,000 and some will take out a great deal more than that.

If we adopt article 4, would it not be fairer to the men and their dependents for the Government at its expense to give to all enlisted men an equal amount of insurance? This would give to the 75 per cent who would not take out the insurance under the optional plan the same protection given to those who would insure and would place all on an equitable basis and at the same time reduce the possibility of future pension claims. Under the plan, as proposed, the men least requiring insurance protection would be the ones most likely to apply for it. The Government can forego the payment of premiums during the war. Indeed, the money covering the payment of such premiums would be small compared with the amount which the Government may be obliged to pay for pensions in future years if this plan, democratic and equitable, is not adopted.

With the governmental guardianship and generosity running throughout the bill, the adoption of this plan will be but more extensively carrying out these ideas. I earnestly hope the change will be made. It will be less expensive in the end and fairer to the enlisted man and his dependents, and to the taxpayer. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD rose.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section be closed. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] desire five minutes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section close in 11 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section close in 11 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet. I reserve the right to object. I should like to have five minutes, germane to this very section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will not the gentleman amend his request so as to give me five minutes? I do not see how you are going to save any time.

Mr. RAYBURN. We will not get through with this bill if we keep on in this way.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. RAYBURN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section close in 11 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the debate on this section close in 11 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes, 56; noes, 27. So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and five gentlemen are present—a quorum. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, when we had under consideration section 203, on page 12, I tried to call attention to what occurred to me might be an oversight. It seems to me that if a soldier earns anything that is unpaid at the time of his death his widow ought to have the first chance to get that money. It was said, in answer to my suggestion, that the widow would not get this money under section 203; that other provisions of the bill gave it to her. I have since read the bill quite carefully, and it seems to me clear that is a mistake; at least it is open to doubt.

Section 201 provides for the allotment of not to exceed one-half of the soldier's pay to his wife or other dependents, but that section also provides that this allotment may be waived. Consequently it may not be necessary to pay anything under section 201 to anybody. Section 203, however, provides that the money not allotted but which might be allotted may be taken, and it clearly contemplates that it shall be taken and held by the Government until the time when the service of the soldier expires.

The money so held is called a deposit and is to be disposed of as follows:

Such deposits, shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, with semiannual rests, and, when payable, shall be paid, principal and interest, to the enlisted man, if living, otherwise to any beneficiary or beneficiaries he may have designated, or if there be no such beneficiary, then to his next of kin.

If the widow gets anything under this provision it is because she is next of kin to her husband.

I call attention to the point that a wife is not next of kin to her husband; that is, the fact of marriage does not make a wife next of kin. I am not unmindful of the fact that there are cases holding a contrary doctrine, but I believe this to be the general rule. It seems to me we ought to amend section 203 by inserting in line 23, after the word "then," the following:

To his widow, if any; otherwise.

This would clearly give her a preference over anyone also claiming to be next of kin.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the matter, because it seems to me that when they get the point that I am trying to bring out they may be disposed to do just what I am urging. It seems perfectly plain to me that if the soldier has a widow his wages ought to go to the widow, unless he sees fit to give them to somebody else; and there is a provision in this bill that he may do so. If he does not give his wages to somebody else we ought to direct that their payment be made to the widow. That is what I am appealing for.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the compensation provisions contained in this bill as originally reported, because I believe that they constitute the least we ought to do for the men who are going to the front. For this reason I regret exceedingly that the House has seen fit to adopt the committee amendment inserting in this section the words "in the line of duty," although as I understood the gentleman from Texas the committee was willing to have the amendment defeated provided that a provision be added that no compensation should be paid where the injury was due to the willful misconduct of the soldier. A further provision might have been added, prohibiting compensation where the injury was suffered while the soldier was intoxicated or was acting in disobedience of orders.

Now, the way we have left this section the burden of proof is on the soldier in every case to prove that he suffered this injury in the line of duty, or it is on his widow in case of his death to show that the death was suffered while the soldier was acting in line of duty. I do not believe we ought to place any such burden upon these men or their dependents. It should be sufficient for them to prove that the injury was received while the soldier was in active service. I believe that the burden should be on the Government to show that the injury was suffered as a result of willful misconduct on the part of the soldier, or occurred when the soldier was acting in disobedience to orders. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I should like to ask the gentleman, if the soldier was hurt in the line of duty, would there not be a hospital record of such injury?

Mr. DALLINGER. I am simply arguing a question of general policy.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I am asking the gentleman a question: If the soldier was hurt in the line of duty, would there not be a hospital record to that effect?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Not always.

Mr. DALLINGER. Not necessarily. I will give the gentleman a case: Let us suppose that one of these boys was given a furlough, as has been suggested, and traveled on a railroad train in the rear of the line somewhere, and while on his furlough was killed in a railroad accident.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is not in the line of duty.

Mr. DALLINGER. No; he would not be strictly in the line of duty, and I believe he ought not to be compelled to prove that he was in the line of duty. These boys are in the service of the Government 24 hours out of 24, just the same as firemen are, and through no fault of their own many of them may be injured while on furlough; and I venture to predict that if we pass this bill in its present form, after the war Congress will be flooded with a lot of special pension bills providing for compensation in cases where boys were injured while on furlough, and many such bills will be passed by Congress, and their enactment will be approved by the country. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Let me say to the gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Pensions, that the same wording is now in the existing law, and there are but very, very few cases where the claimant asks for special legislation because he can not get relief under existing law.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, there are thousands of such cases.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Well, only very few of them.

Mr. DYER. What about these thousands of widows under the pension bills that the gentleman has had passed by this House. Those were cases where the soldier and the widow could not show origin of disability in the line of duty.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is an entirely different field. That would be a service pension, and that is the point I made to the amendment that was offered.

Mr. DALLINGER. I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. DALLINGER. We are passing something new here. We are passing a compensation law. We are giving to the soldiers and sailors who are engaged in the service of this country in this great war insurance against accident.

Now, when a man takes out accident insurance in a private company, he gets that benefit wherever and whenever he is injured, unless such injury is the result of his own willful misconduct, and I believe we ought to treat the boys at the front in the same way. If the injury is not due to their willful misconduct, or if they are not acting in disobedience of orders, they ought to have compensation under this act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I realize that it is very difficult to draft any piece of new legislation, and I am not in sympathy with the wholesale and indiscriminate criticism to which this bill has been subjected. I believe that on the whole it is very well drawn. I believe, however, that the bill in its original form, without the words "in the line of duty," was a better bill than it is now since the committee amendment has been agreed to; although I admit that the qualifying provisions suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] should have been added.

I hope, however, that the bill will pass. I shall vote for it with pleasure, but I do hope that it will be amended elsewhere and thus made more liberal and more just. Moreover, it ought to be passed speedily, because until this bill is passed there is no legislation whatever on the statute books for Federal aid to the dependent families of soldiers while they are at the front, and there has been no such legislation in force since the withdrawal of the troops from Mexico in the spring of the present year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman I reserved one minute to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey offers the following amendment: Page 17, line 9, after the word "compensation," insert the words "by way of pension."

Mr. ADAMSON. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to say, before any point is taken on that, that the only object of this amendment is to enable those who construe this bill to construe it according to the determinations already made as to the meaning of the language by the Pension Bureau.

Mr. ADAMSON. "And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." We are getting away from that old system and establishing a new and scientific system. To go back to that old system is not germane to the bill at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not germane, and sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 301. That if death results from injury—

If from a marriage contracted before injury the deceased leaves a widow or child, or if he leaves a widowed mother substantially dependent upon him for support, the monthly compensation shall be the following percentages of his pay:

- (a) For a widow alone, 25 per cent, but not less than $30.
- (b) For a widow and one child, 35 per cent, but not less than $40.
- (c) For a widow and two children, 40 per cent, but not less than $50, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $5, for each additional child up to two.
- (d) If there be no widow, then for one child, 20 per cent, but not less than $15.
- (e) For two children, 30 per cent, but not less than $25.
- (f) For three children, 40 per cent, but not less than $35, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $10, for each additional child up to two.
- (g) For a widowed mother, 20 per cent, but not less than $25. The amount payable under this subdivision shall not be greater than a sum which, when added to the total amount payable to the widow and children, does not exceed 50 per cent of the pay or $60, whichever is the greater. This compensation shall be payable for the death of but one child, and no compensation for the death of a child shall be payable if such widowed mother is in receipt of compensation under the provisions of this article for the death of her husband.

The maximum monthly compensation for death shall be $200.

If the death occurs after discharge or resignation from service, the United States shall pay burial expenses not to exceed $100, as may be fixed by regulations.

The payment of compensation to a widow or widowed mother shall continue until her death or remarriage.

The payment of compensation to or for a child shall continue until such child reaches the age of 18 years or marries, or if such child be incapable, because of mental or physical infirmity, of pursuing any substantially gainful occupation, then until marriage or death or until such incapacity ceases.

Whenever the compensation payable to or for the benefit of any person under the provisions of this section is terminated by the happening of the contingency upon which it is limited, the compensation thereafter for the remaining beneficiary or beneficiaries, if any, shall be the amount which would have been payable to them if they had been the sole original beneficiaries.

As between the widow and the children not in her custody, and as between children, the amount of the compensation shall be apportioned as may be prescribed by regulations.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 17, line 12, after the word "if," insert "from a marriage contracted before injury."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have conferred with the other side of the House and I think the committee had better rise. The opinion over there and upon this side is that we can easily finish the bill to-morrow.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment on the desk to this section, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an amendment which he intends to offer to this section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Mr. BLACK offers the following amendment to section 301 of article 3: In lines 17 and 18, page 17, after the word "alone," on line 17, strike out the words "25 per cent, but not less than $30," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$35," so that subdivision (a) as amended will read: "(a) For a widow alone, $35."

Also, in lines 19 and 20, after the word "child," in line 19, on page 17, strike out the words "35 per cent, but not less than $40," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$45," so that subdivision (b) as amended will read: "(b) For a widow and one child, $45."

Also, in lines 21, 22, and 23, after the word "children," in line 21, on page 17, strike out the words "40 per cent, but not less than $50, 5 per cent additional, but not less than," and in lieu thereof insert "$52.50," so that subdivision (c) as amended will read: "(c) For a widow and two children, $52.50, with $5 for each additional child up to two."

Also, in lines 24 and 25, after the word "child," in line 24, on page 17, strike out the words "20 per cent, but not less than $15," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$20," so that subdivision (d) as amended will read: "(d) If there be no widow, then for one child, $20."

Also, in lines 1 and 2, page 18, after the word "children," in line 1, on page 18, strike out the words "30 per cent, but not less than $25," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$35," so that subdivision (e) as amended will read: "(e) For two children, $35."

Also, in lines 3 and 4, page 18, after the word "children," in line 3, on page 18, strike out the words "40 per cent, but not less than $35, 5 per cent additional, but not less than," and insert in lieu of the language stricken out the figures "$45," so that subdivision (f) as amended will read: "(f) For three children, $45, with $10 for each additional child up to two."

Also, in lines 6 and 7, on page 18, after the word "mother," in line 6, strike out the words "20 per cent, but not less than $25," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$30"; and in lines 10 and 11, on page 18, after the word "exceed," in line 10, strike out the words "50 per cent of the pay, or $60, whichever is the greater," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$75," so that subdivision (g) as amended will read: "(g) For a widowed mother, $30. The amount payable under this subdivision shall not be greater than a sum which when added to the total amount payable to the widow and children does not exceed $75. This compensation shall be payable for the death of but one child, and no compensation for the death of a child shall be payable if such widowed mother is in receipt of compensation under the provisions of this article for the death of her husband."

Also, strike out all of lines 16 and 17 on page 18.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] asked if this bill was approved by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Interior. I ask leave to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a paper in regard to that matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The paper is as follows:

WASHINGTON, September 11, 1917.

Hon. JULIAN MACK,
Room 43, Treasury Department.

MY DEAR JUDGE MACK: Following is an excerpt from the minutes of the meeting of the Council of National Defense of August 10:

"There was held a special meeting of the Council of National Defense on August 10, 1917, at 9.30 o'clock a. m., at the office of the Secretary of War. There were present Chairman Baker, Secretary Daniels, Secretary Lane, Secretary Wilson, and the director.

"It was voted that the council ratify the action taken at the meeting of the council of August 9, 1917, as reported in the minutes of that date, there being no quorum present at that meeting."

Cordially, yours,

RALPH A. HAYES, Private Secretary.

WASHINGTON, September 11, 1917.

Hon. JULIAN W. MACK,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE MACK: The following is a transcript of the minutes of the meeting of the Council of National Defense of August 9, 1917:

"There was held a special meeting of the Council of National Defense on August 9, 1917, at 4.30 o'clock p. m., at the office of the Secretary of the Navy. There were present Chairman Baker, Secretary Daniels and Secretary Wilson, Commissioner Gompers, Judge Mack, and the director.

"Judge Mack presented the draft of a bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and explained to the council its provisions in detail."

"The council approved in principle the policies contained in the aforesaid bill, and extended a vote of thanks to Commissioner Gompers and Judge Mack, and those associated with them, in appreciation of the excellent work done by them in its preparation. The chairman was directed to report this action to the President."

Cordially, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Acting Chairman Council of National Defense.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on section 203.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I propose to offer as substitutes for sections 400 and 401 the following, and ask that they be inserted at this point in the RECORD:

SEC. 400. That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female), and to the Navy Nurse Corps (female), when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department, greater protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in Article III, the United States during war, without any charge and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against death or total disability of every person in the sum of $5,000.

Such insurance shall terminate 120 days after the war during which it is granted, or if the insured shall have been discharged or shall resign from the service prior to that time it shall terminate 120 days after such discharge or resignation; Provided, however, That a dishonorable or bad conduct discharge from the service shall immediately terminate such insurance; And provided further, That such termination shall not affect the liability of the United States to pay for death or total disability occurring prior to such termination.

The United States, prior to the termination of such insurance as herein provided, upon the application of the insured to the bureau, and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against death or total disability of any such person in any multiple of $500 and not less than $1,000 or more than $5,000, in such form or forms of insurance and with such provisions for premium payments as may be provided by regulation.

SEC. 401. Any person in active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who, while in such service and before the passage of this act, has become totally disabled or has died shall be deemed to have been granted insurance in the sum of $5,000, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die before he shall have secured 240 of such installments, the balance of such 240 monthly installments shall be paid, but only if and while there survive him a wife, child, or widowed mother, and in that event the amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between them as may be provided by regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing at this point the two amendments that he proposes to offer to this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. Does he expect to get a vote on this bill to-morrow?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment? Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, are all of these requests to extend remarks upon this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen so state. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. ADAMSON was then agreed to.

So the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend the act to establish a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House resolution 128, which was adopted yesterday and of which I am the author.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

PICKETING AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of picketing at the White House. Coming from Colorado, I am an ardent friend of woman's suffrage and believe that it is an inherent right of every woman to vote. I have lived under woman suffrage for the last 23 years in Colorado, and it has worked well. I was requested by the Woman's Party in Colorado to investigate Occoquan.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not debatable.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado have two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that I was transgressing the rules of the House. I want to say that the reason I ask to extend my remarks is that I have been requested in numerous telegrams from the Woman's Party in Colorado to report to the House my examination at Occoquan relative to the treatment of the persons there. I have investigated the matter and have expressed my opinion that in my judgment they were wrongfully detained. They were arrested for obstructing the traffic, and in my judgment it is not a charge upon which they should have been sent to Occoquan. I am requested to extend to the House the opinion that I have stated to this organization in a letter recently sent to Mrs. Fowler, State chairman, and for that purpose I ask to have the five telegrams and my reply thereto as to the treatment of these women and their unjust detention at Occoquan printed in the RECORD. I am an ardent advocate of the right of woman's suffrage, but opposed to the plan of picketing as a measure calculated to secure its adoption.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, how many of these telegrams are there?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. There are only five short telegrams.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The telegrams are as follows:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., August 20, 1917.

HON. CHAS. B. TIMBERLAKE,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the women voters of Colorado Springs would urge you to use your influence with Members of Congress to secure the passage of Baer resolution to investigate picketing and rioting at the White House.

J. F. AVERY, Mayor.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., September 4, 1917.

HON. CHAS. B. TIMBERLAKE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Urgent that you insist upon seeing Miss Gray at Occoquan immediately.

MRS. L. T. GRAY.
CAROLINE E. S. SPENCER.
H. F. AVERY.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., August 29, 1917.

HON. CHAS. TIMBERLAKE,
Washington, D. C.:

Occoquan food conditions shocking. Your personal investigation and action urgent.

BERTHA W. FOWLER.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., August 27, 1917.

HON. CHAS. B. TIMBERLAKE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Please visit Miss Natalie Gray at once in Occoquan Workhouse, and make personal investigation of sanitary and food conditions imposed upon our imprisoned women, as Senator Lewis is doing for Mrs. Watson and Miss Ewing, of Illinois. Please report results.

COLORADO STATE COMMITTEE NATIONAL WOMAN'S PARTY,
BERTHA W. FOWLER, Chairman.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., September 10, 1917.

HON. CHAS. B. TIMBERLAKE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly beg you to make clear on the floor of the House, without delay, your attitude on the illegality of the arrest and imprisonment of suffrage pickets, as stated to Mrs. Fowler and Mrs. Gray in letters and telegrams.

COLORADO STATE COMMITTEE NATIONAL WOMAN'S PARTY,
BERTHA W. FOWLER, Chairman.

SUFFRAGISTS AT WORKHOUSE NOT ABUSED AS REPORTED—CONGRESSMAN TIMBERLAKE.

Mrs. Bertha M. Fowler, of this city, has received a letter from Congressman TIMBERLAKE, written after a personal investigation of conditions at Occoquan workhouse where suffragist pickets are serving sentence, which shows that he finds little fault with the food, quarters, working, or sanitary conditions at the workhouse, and says that, while four of the women are in the hospital, they are there to keep them from talking rather than from any weakened physical condition.

Congressman TIMBERLAKE's letter describes circumstantially the conditions in Occoquan as he found them and assures Mrs. Fowler that, while the confinement is irksome, it is not as serious as reports indicated.

CONGRESSMAN'S LETTER.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE's communication follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. FOWLER: Your telegram of August 29, in which you say, "Occoquan food conditions shocking," and request my personal investigation, duly received, and in reply I desire to say that at the time of the receipt of your telegram at my office I spent that afternoon in this investigation in company with Congressman ELLIOTT, of Indiana, and Congressman LONERGAN, of Connecticut, and, accompanied by Mrs. Baker, an earnest friend of the cause of suffrage, and connected with the District press, we autted to Occoquan for this investigation. Miss Morey had called at my office in the morning, and, upon being informed that I contemplated, in company with the other Members of the House, going to Occoquan that afternoon, she requested that we come to the Cameron House and confer with Miss Paul, Miss Martin, and others who desired to mention some of the conditions for our special investigation.

While there we were introduced to a former employee of that institution, who outlined some conditions relative to the sanitation in connection therewith, which the authorities of the Cameron House were desirous to have us especially inquire into.

REFUSED PERMISSION.

We proceeded to the institution and were refused admission by the matron of the women's quarters unless we could show written permission given by the superintendent or by the District Commissioners. We had procured none of these permissions, relying upon meeting Mr. Whitaker, the superintendent, who, we felt, would not refuse Members of Congress permission to make this investigation. The superintendent, however, was that afternoon in Washington, and no one on the place had this authority. The assistant superintendent, Capt. Reams, who had full charge of the male contingent, offered us every facility to investigate that part of the institution. It was near the dinner hour, and we were thus enabled to see what was served the prisoners for the meal. Mrs. Baker, who accompanied us, was permitted to taste every article of food with which they were served, as were we all. We observed where the different articles of food were cooked, where the bread was baked, witnessed the serving of the prisoners, and tasted every article of food furnished. There could be no criticism of the quality, the quantity, or the character of this food. It is true, for the evening meal, they had only water to drink, coffee being served only at the morning meal. No butter was served with this meal, nor is it ever served, while the bread used by the entire institution, including officers and prisoners, was baked there; the balance of the cooking for the women's department is done by the women themselves. No corn bread was available for examination by us in order that we might investigate the reports that had been circulated with reference to its not being eatable. The wheat bread, however, was of very fine quality, and to which no objection whatever could be made by any person. The sanitary condition of the sleeping quarters seemed to be all that could be expected in an institution of that kind. The dining room and the kitchen were scrupulously clean.

Not having had the opportunity to investigate the women's quarters, we returned the following day, having previously gotten permission from the superintendent so to do. We made the same thorough inspection of the female quarters that we had made of the male quarters the previous day. We were conducted through every department by Supt. Whitaker. We did not allow a hasty investigation, but examined critically into every feature of the place.

EXAMINED FOOD.

We saw the prisoners eat their noon lunch, examined their food, and were permitted to meet each one of our constituents confined there, and I had a very pleasant 15 minutes' conversation with Miss Natalie Gray. She says tell friends that her incarceration has not dampened her ardor for the cause. She says she is wrongfully incarcerated, and I agree therewith, and this is a matter that should be investigated, being a matter of law, rather than investigate the conditions of a public institution of that kind as to their treatment during incarceration.

The confinement there is irksome, and is felt keenly by the six women suffragists, four of whom are in the hospital ward, each occupying a separate room; the other two during work hours are in the sewing room. They are all required to work at sewing. The work of those in the hospital being carried to their individual rooms only for the purpose, as stated by the superintendent, of preventing their engaging in conversation when they are all together in one room, which they insisted upon doing, and which the superintendent says is against the rules of the institution; and, being indulged in by these women, if permitted, would give a bad precedent to other inmates who were not allowed this privilege, even though it took drastic measures to prevent, which, the superintendent informed us, he did not desire to adopt these measures with these women, and recognizing the importance of this rule being complied with, he thought best to remove them to the hospital ward.

I have conferred several times with Congressman BAER, who introduced the resolution mentioned in my former telegram, and which had been referred to the District Committee for report. Mr. BAER informed me that he was endeavoring to get a hearing in order to induce the committee to report on it for action by Congress. I advised him of my willingness to aid him in any way possible, and, if it was possible to arrange for me to do so at this hearing, I desire to be heard thereat.

UNJUSTLY INCARCERATED.

I can not help but feel that these pickets are unjustly incarcerated. They have been picketing since January without disturbance at all until recently. The District police and the court officers have said it was not the nature of the banners which caused the arrest, but that their offense was in obstructing traffic on the street. If they were within their rights in displaying these banners, it was not they who obstructed traffic, but it was the unruly crowd upon the street that had this effect, and, in my judgment, it was the plain duty of the police force to have protected the pickets in their rights and to have arrested those who, by their assault upon them, did interfere with traffic; and, more than this, they violated the law in forcibly taking from these pickets their personal property, the banners they carried, and destroying the same. These are the parties, in my judgment, that now ought to be in Occoquan; and while I do not believe it is a matter with which the Congress can deal, being simply a violation of the law, and if these women have not violated the law they are unlawfully detained.

I have endeavored to give you the conditions as I saw them at Occoquan, and I believe that a thorough examination should be made by Congress of the conditions there in justice to the institution itself. But this is not contemplated in the resolution introduced by Congressman BAER.

Very sincerely, yours,

CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE.

I am still firmly of the opinion that present plans of picketing is not calculated to hasten the accomplishment of our desire, the enfranchisement of women. This, however, will not deter me in any effort I may put forth to see that their other constitutional rights are not abridged.

C. B. T.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech made by my colleague, Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina, on the subject of the war resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by his colleague [Mr. NICHOLLS]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2785. An act to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, September 13, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriations for the service of the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 365); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the acting president of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a detailed statement of the expenditures from the appropriation for contingent expenses for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 366); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HARRISON of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 6044) to authorize the appointment of registered pharmacists first and second lieutenants in the Medical Corps of the Army and the Medical Officers Reserve Corps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CARAWAY: A bill (H. R. 6045) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, in Poinsett County, Ark., at or near the section line between sections 35 and 36, township 11 north, range 6 east; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. STEELE: A bill (H. R. 6046) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: Resolution (H. Res. 139) making certain inquiries of the Secretary of the Treasury; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

By Mr. BURNETT: Resolution (H. Res. 140) providing for the consideration of H. R. 5667; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 152) prohibiting the loaning of money to the existing Government in Mexico and the governmental indorsement of financial engagements between citizens of the United States and citizens of Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 6047) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Carpenter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 6048) granting an increase of pension to Dennis W. Riordan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 6049) granting an increase of pension to Susan T. Lisk; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DILL: A bill (H. R. 6050) granting a pension to C. F. Dugas; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DOWELL: A bill (H. R. 6051) granting an increase of pension to David Hunter, jr.; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. QUIN: A bill (H. R. 6052) for the relief of I. N. Ellis; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Miss RANKIN: A bill (H. R. 6053) granting a pension to Elizabeth S. Foster; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6054) granting a pension to Louis A. Holonbek; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 6055) granting an increase of pension to John Hodges; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TINKHAM: A bill (H. R. 6056) to pay to Bernice L. Blair the sum of $12,470, with interest; to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. GOULD: Petition of the rural mail carriers of Seneca County, State of New York, favoring legislation to create a court of appeals for those who may be dismissed from the service; also favoring a maximum mail route of 24 miles; also favoring an allowance of $300 for maintenance of equipment; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. RAKER: Petition of John R. Benton, chairman home preservation committee, Stevensville, Kent Island, Md., protesting against the purchase by the Government of Kent Island for a proving ground; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Robert N. Lynch, vice president and manager Chamber of Commerce, San Francisco, Cal., relative to embargo conditions and necessities of securing export licenses; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of County Clare Association, of San Francisco, Cal., urging self-government of the Irish people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. STINESS: Petition of Lady Lincoln Council, No. 5, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Providence, R. I., favoring Senate joint resolution 84, providing for the drafting of aliens other than alien enemies; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Commodore Perry Council, No. 14, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Wakefield, R. I., favoring the passage of House bills 4852 and 5369, relative to immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 13, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, high and mighty Ruler of the Universe, we come reverently before Thee to ask Thy blessing and guidance. Especially we pray that Thou wilt vouchsafe to Thy servants in this Senate the Divine guidance and wisdom that they may discharge the duties that are upon them; that as they face responsibilities that they dare not face in the strength of human mind and human wisdom they may look to God for guidance. Do Thou, O blessed God of our fathers, give to them such direction, throw about them such influence, point out such a way as that the problems facing us may be solved in accordance with Thy will, and peace and happiness come again in this Nation and in the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INVITATION FROM GREAT BRITAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is aware of the following rule of the Senate:

No petition or memorial or other paper signed by citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received, unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

The Chair, however, does not believe that that rule is being violated by laying before the Senate the following communication and referring it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, requesting that proper consideration be given it. The Chair or the committee can answer the communication. The Secretary will read it.

The communication was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

[Cablegram.]

LONDON, September 12, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

Washington:

We have the honor to convey through you to the Senate and the House of Representatives a cordial invitation to send as many delegates as may be willing to come on a visit to Britain and the British fronts. We are authorized by the Government to say that such visitors would be the guests of the British people and every effort would be made to show them all sides of our work in the war. As Parliament is not in session, it is unfortunately impossible for us to obtain the direct authority of the members of the British Parliament for this invitation, but we feel sure that they would most warmly welcome the opportunity of meeting our colleagues of the Legislature of the United States.

FINLAY,

Lord Chancellor.

J. W. LOWTHER,

Speaker of the House of Commons.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed statement of the expenditures from the appropriation for contingent expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of the president and officers of the Farmers' Union of Arkansas, praying for national equal suffrage, which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a memorial of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church South, of El Paso, Tex., remonstrating against the taxing and favoring the prohibition of the liquor business as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of McCracken, Kans., and a petition of sundry citizens of Havensville, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the return of the bodies of dead soldiers to this country in a sanitary and recognizable condition, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WAR CREDITS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Finance I report back the bill H. R. 5901, being an act to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, with a recommendation that the same do pass the Senate as reported. There are sundry amendments to the bill proposed by the Finance Committee.

It has not been thought worth while to have the committee file a formal report on the bill. There are only a few amendments proposed by the Finance Committee to the bill as it came from the House. Most of those, practically all of them, are amendments suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Secretary of the Treasury was before the committee and made a comprehensive statement, giving the reasons why these various amendments should be added to the bill, and also some other officials of the Treasury Department were present at the same time the Secretary was before us, and made statements. These various statements will be instructive and valuable, and they will be printed along with the hearings of the House, so that two sets of hearings will be embodied in one pamphlet for the use of the Senate. They will be on the desks of Senators to-morrow morning.

The Committee on Finance believe that a formal report could add little to what the Secretary of the Treasury and those accompanying him said, all of which, as I have stated, will be laid to-morrow morning before the Senate. Moreover, this morning the Finance Committee has had laid upon the desk of each Senator a committee print of the bill as reported, so that Senators may have an opportunity during the day to examine the bill and the amendments proposed thereto. I will say further that the report of Representative KITCHIN, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, when the bill was returned to the House from that committee, is available. That report covers the general scope and purpose of the bill. Any Senator desiring to review it has only to send for it.

I now ask that the bill may be printed in the usual form for the use of the Senate, and I give notice that on to-morrow morning I shall move to take the bill up and make it the unfinished business of the Senate, with the hope that its consideration may be concluded to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 2878) granting the consent of Congress to the Whiteville Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Wacamaw River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2879) for the relief of The Boyle Co., of Wichita, Kans.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2880) granting a pension to Esther U. McKelvey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2881) granting an increase of pension to William Barklow (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

EMBARGO ON COTTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Department of Agriculture has recently given out a statement contradicting reports about the effect of placing cotton on the embargo list. I desire to ask permission of the Senate to have that statement read and then to supplement it with a few additional facts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The statement was given out on account of the misapprehension growing up as to the amount of cotton going to neutral countries in Europe and as to the effect which the embargo should have upon the market. I send the article to the desk to be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NO MATERIAL DECREASE IN EXPORTS OF COTTON—REDUCTION IN SHIPMENTS TO EUROPEAN NEUTRALS TO HAVE BUT SMALL EFFECT.

No material decrease in the volume of cotton exports from the United States should result from license restrictions recently placed on the shipment of that staple, the Department of Agriculture announces.

Reports that reduction in shipments to the European neutrals will cut off markets for 4,000,000 bales are branded as absurd by the department, which presents figures to show that the neutrals last year took only 700,000 bales.

"With the present crop of 12,499,000 bales," said the department's statement, "and with a record of 7,491,086 bales taken in the United States last year, with an unprecedentedly small carry over, with Liverpool and continental stocks nearly 500,000 bales less than last year, with dry goods stocks low everywhere, and a certain increase of demand in the United States, due to the mobilization of 2,000,000 soldiers within 12 months and supplying them with khaki and tents, there is no reason whatever for doubt that there will be demand for all the American cotton in sight available for export."

"Last year's American takings were 7,491,086 bales and last year's exports 5,947,165 bales, a total of 13,438,250 bales, or 939,250 bales more than the estimated crop this year."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the embargo act was intended to make it certain that none of our products reached our enemies to help them in the war against us, and no loyal American citizen would object to a sacrifice of markets for his own product to accomplish such a result. An Export Administrative Board has been appointed, and it will facilitate the shipment of American products under rules and regulations which will make it impossible for them to reach our enemies, but which will place no obstacle in the way of their reaching our allies or points where they can not reach our enemies. The embargo will only affect neutral markets.

The statement of the Department of Agriculture is that less than 700,000 bales of cotton went last year to the neutrals of Europe. I find that less than 600,000 bales went to them. I hold in my hand Bulletin 134 of the Department of Commerce, which shows that only 598,000 bales of cotton went to the neutrals of Europe last year, and 366,262 of those bales went to Spain. As Spain is entirely cut off from Germany and from Austria there is no difficulty at all about furnishing Spain cotton without danger of the cotton reaching Germany or Austria.

The cotton really to be affected by this embargo is cotton going to Holland, to Denmark, to Norway, and to Sweden. Switzerland is the only other country contiguous to Germany and Austria, and the cotton to Switzerland goes through Italy or through France, both of which are our allies and control shipments. Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden received in all last year only 233,000 bales of cotton. Switzerland received about 50,000 bales of cotton. So all the European countries to be in any way affected by this embargo received less than 300,000 bales of cotton last year.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit a question there, I think he stated that Spain received last year 366,000 bales.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I ask the Senator if he can state how much cotton Spain received in the years before that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the war Spain received usually a little less than that quantity, but Spain has enlarged the output of her mills, supplying her own people in part with products which before they had bought from Germany and Austria, and furnishing now also a part of the territory in other countries that Germany and Austria had supplied before the war. There is not the slightest suspicion or possibility that any cotton going to Spain is not consumed by the mills of Spain and kept for use in Spain. The increase by Spain since the war beyond her consumption before the war is some 30,000 bales annually; perhaps as much as 50,000 bales; but that subject has been carefully examined, and the increase is fully accounted for by the increased work of her mills and her broadened market.

Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden can receive cotton shipped to them direct. As I said a moment ago, those four countries during the last year, as shown by our census report, Bulletin 134—and the figures I use are found in this bulletin—received only 233,833 bales. During the first six months of this year the shipments to those four countries were reduced to 57,000 bales. So if the entire cotton shipments to the neutrals that might furnish it to Germany and Austria were stopped, it would have no appreciable effect upon the cotton market.

Their shipments have been curtailed because Great Britain has entirely controlled, since the spring of 1915, the cotton shipments to Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden.

The English Government made an agreement on June 24, 1915, with Sweden, limiting shipments of cotton to Sweden, and requiring that they should be confined exclusively to the Swedish Cotton Spinners' Association, from which association, under British supervision, the mills of Sweden are supplied. The amount allotted to Sweden by Great Britain was first 10,000 bales per month. Later on it was reduced to 9,000 bales per month.

No cotton has been allowed to go to Sweden by Great Britain except to that one association, and Great Britain preserved supervision over its distribution to consuming factories.

On August 23, 1915, Great Britain made an arrangement with Denmark by which all cotton going to Denmark was to be received by the Danish Chamber of Industry. The quantity of cotton was limited to 2,950 bales of cotton per month, and Great Britain supervised the distribution.

On August 31, 1915, Great Britain made an arrangement with Norway by which no cotton should go to Norway except that consigned to the Norwegian Cotton Mills Association. The quantity was limited to 1,584 bales of cotton per month. Great Britain supervised the distribution of the cotton and saw to it, through her representatives, that it was used exclusively by the mills of Norway.

On September 1, 1916, Great Britain made an arrangement with Holland by which all cotton going to Holland was consigned to the Netherlands Overseas Trust, and she safeguarded re-exports by requiring guaranties as to use. The shipments of cotton to Holland, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark for the last 18 months have been completely under control and supervision by the British Government. As I stated before, last year the total shipments of cotton to those four countries amounted to only 233,833 bales.

Cotton goes to Switzerland through Italy and France. I hold in my hand a letter from the State Department inclosing a letter from our ambassador at Rome and from the English ambassador at Rome.

It has never been suggested that any cotton passed through France into Switzerland that was permitted to reach Germany or Austria.

A claim has been made that Italy has increased her purchases of cotton and that cotton has gone from Italy into Austria or through Switzerland into Germany and Austria. This subject has been one of investigation by the State Department and by our ambassador at Rome. I hold the report upon the subject in my hand. Both the English ambassador and our own ambassador assure the State Department that cotton going to Switzerland does not reach Austria or Germany. Ever since Italy entered the war the strictest supervision has been given of cotton shipments out of Italy into Switzerland. Of course all shipments into Austria have ceased.

In Switzerland there was organized the Société Suisse de Surveillance Economique. No cotton has been permitted for nearly two years to reach Switzerland through Italy or France except under consignment to that organization, which is rationed in amounts found by the French commission and by the Italian Government necessary for Swiss use; and supervision is made of the distribution by this society. None is permitted to go except to manufacturers who are trusted; and the cotton has been carefully followed to see that none left Switzerland, the total shipments to Switzerland being something less annually than the amount received before the war.

Mr. President, what I desired to do is to show that for our Government to place an embargo on cotton shipments and put the shipments under control of our Exports Administrative Board is for our Government simply to do what Great Britain has been doing; certainly no more than that. Not 300,000 bales of cotton reached the five countries named last year, and that cotton reached them with the approval of our allies under an arrangement that guaranteed that not a bale should get to our enemies. Now, under our Exports Administrative Board the same course will be followed, the board will freely permit cotton to go to our allies and to Spain. The board will supervise and restrict and watch every bale, as they should, that goes to the five countries contiguous to Germany and Austria. I would vastly rather that not a bale of the 300,000 should find a market than that any should go to Germany or Austria. I do not wish to be misunderstood about that.

What I wish is to let the cotton grower understand that in placing cotton on the embargo list his Government has done him no harm. Our Government has not by the embargo lessened the markets for cotton raised by our citizens.

What I furthermore wish is to let the trade understand that if this embargo is used as a bear argument to force down the price of cotton it is unfair, illogical, and deceptive.

An erroneous impression has been created by the publication of false figures of alleged shipments to neutrals of northern Europe and to Germany. Our cotton spinners, the southern cotton spinners as well as the New England spinners, are in part responsible for the misapprehension of the facts. I will not say that their action was dictated by selfish motives, although it is true that they sell their mill output ahead from 6 to 12 months, and base their prices in the spring largely upon the existing prices of cotton; and they sold cotton goods ahead at prices based upon cotton selling at from 25 to 30 cents a pound. After doing that they circulated the report that vast quantities of cotton were going to Europe and into Germany and Austria, and claimed that cotton must be put upon the list of embargoed articles to prevent Germany from making munitions out of cotton.

Mr. President, how misinformed they were. How unfortunate and unfair it is for men to talk on a subject or write on a subject when they know nothing about it. Anyone at all who has studied the subject knows that Germany has not made nitrocellulose powders out of cotton for over two years. The little cotton Germany had was used for clothes. Their nitrocellulose powders since the summer of 1915 have been made out of wood cellulose. But what did these good men do? They issued a statement about the enormous quantities of cotton that had gone to Germany since the war, confusing the years of the shipments, failing entirely to say when it went.

It is true that we have shipped large quantities of cotton to Germany since the war in Europe began, but not since we entered the war. It is true that in the winter of 1914-15 we shipped about 3,000,000 bales of cotton either directly to Germany or through the neutrals of Europe to Germany and Austria, and we had a right to do it. Mr. President, on October 22, 1914, I presented a resolution to the Senate setting out our rights. The Senate unanimously passed the resolution and appointed a committee of five to investigate certain undue influences thrown around the trade by Great Britain at that time that were depriving us of our rights. I ask that a copy of the resolution be printed in the Record in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The resolution referred to is as follows:

[Resolution introduced by Senator HOKE SMITH, Oct. 22, 1914. Unanimously adopted by the Senate the same day.]

Whereas the European war has seriously interfered with the market of two of our greatest national export products, lint cotton and cottonseed oil; and

Whereas although lint cotton and cottonseed oil are not contraband of war, serious impediments are being placed in the way of shipments of these commodities to belligerent countries; and

Whereas shippers who desire to export cotton and cottonseed oil are finding it difficult to do so: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be named by the Chair to confer with the departments with reference thereto, and to report to the Senate as early as possible the result of their investigations.

In pursuance of the foregoing resolution, the Chair appointed on the committee Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, and Mr. JONES. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Oct. 22, 1914.)

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Within four days we received from the British ambassador a statement that Sir Edward Grey conceded our right to ship cotton direct to Germany. England had placed no blockade around German ports, and cotton was non-contraband. I ask that the letter from the British ambassador be printed as part of my remarks in the Record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

On the 26th of October, 1914, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice wrote Mr. Lansing, then Acting Secretary of State, as follows:

"Last night I received a reply from Sir Edward Grey, in which he authorizes me to give the assurance that cotton will not be seized. He points out that cotton has not been put in any of our lists of contraband, and, as your department must be aware from the draft proclamation now in your possession, it is not proposed to include it in our new list of contraband. It is, therefore, as far as Great Britain is concerned, in the free list, and will remain there."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, after this declaration by Great Britain that cotton was free, and had a right to go to Germany, direct or through neutral ports, during December, January, and February of 1914 and 1915 we shipped great quantities of cotton into Germany direct and to neutral ports destined for Germany. Germany and Austria absorbed about 3,000,000 bales of the crop of 1914 without objection on the part of our present allies, although they were then at war with Germany. But, Mr. President, on March 12, 1915, Great Britain began a blockade of German ports, and issued the celebrated order in council that thereafter the British Government would hold itself free to stop all shipments of goods of German origin or destination.

The good cotton manufacturers to whom I have referred, who issued their publication about the shipments of cotton to Germany and Austria, failed entirely to discriminate as to when the shipments were made. After the order of March 12, 1915, England began stopping all shipments that were going to Germany, and later on in the fall of 1915 took control of shipments to Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, and, as I have already pointed out, so completely regulated those shipments as to finally suppress all shipments of cotton destined to Germany or Austria or that could reach either of those countries.

Mr. President, since the war began, in spite of the large crop which we raised in 1914, the world has consumed 1,500,000 more bales of lint cotton than the world has produced. Last year the world consumed nearly 2,000,000 bales more than the world's production. The surplus cotton that existed before the war began has been practically wiped out. Last year 13,690,000 bales of cotton raised in the United States were consumed. American consumption of cotton has enormously increased. The German and Austrian consumption of cotton was by their mills, and the product they manufactured was only in part consumed in those countries. At first the loss of those markets was a great blow to the cotton producer; but American mills and other mills, Japanese and Spanish mills, have reached out for the trade formerly belonging to Germany, and they now consume much more cotton than they did before the war began and have taken the place as a market for at least half of the cotton consumed by German and Austrian mills.

Last year, as I said, the world consumed 13,690,000 bales of cotton raised in the United States; our allies consumed 5,223,371 bales, and the United States alone consumed 7,684,813 bales, so that our allies and the United States consumed last year 13,000,000 bales. The Agricultural Department's estimate for this year's crop is 12,499,000 bales. The United States and our allies consumed last year 500,000 more bales of cotton raised in the United States than this year's crop will be, and other friendly neutrals consumed more than 500,000 additional bales. So that, Mr. President, if we should stop every bale of cotton going to the neutrals contiguous to Germany and Austria still the supply this year would fall 700,000 bales below last year's consumption; and, as I stated, the consumption of the past four years has consumed a million and a half more bales than the world has produced.

Mr. President, there should be no trouble from the embargo placed upon cotton shipments by our Government, and no loyal citizen should feel irritated about it, although we may justly condemn the false publication and unfair use made of the embargo in an effort to reduce prices. I would have the cotton farmer understand that it will only attach to 300,000 bales and substitute the supervision of our Government for the supervision of Great Britain as to shipment of these 300,000. I would have him further understand that these shipments will still take place, and last year's demands for cotton exceeded what this year's crop will be by 700,000 bales, even if no cotton could go to Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, or Switzerland. Cotton growers should understand that open markets will need this year more cotton than they will have for sale.

Mr. President, corn and wheat are selling at 100 per cent higher than they were before the war. There are at least equal reasons for an increase in the price of lint cotton—not only equal reasons, but certain reasons that do not apply to corn and wheat.

Very much of the cotton land depends for its successful culture upon the use of potash and nitrogen, the third plant food required for the cotton being phosphorus. Phosphorus we can still easily obtain from our phosphate rock, abundantly found in this country; but our nitrogen was made out of saltpeter from Chile; our potash we obtained from Germany. The prices of potash have risen 1,000 per cent, and the nitrogen needed for fertilizers almost as much. The loss of labor due to the high prices in the East has drawn from the supply of the cotton States, and now the war again makes a draft. The crop is short. The cost of the crop to the farmer has been very, very high.

The entire country—not one section—should feel an interest in the cotton crop. It is certainly one of our greatest American assets, if not the greatest. Shipped abroad it brings to the United States credit balances and gold in excess of any other commodity entering into commerce. During the past century the cotton crop sold abroad has either given us a credit or brought us gold to the amount of over $20,000,000,000. It is indeed a great national asset. I would have all of our country realize that we are all interested in the prosperity and success of the cotton grower, and I would have no prejudice by spinner, North or South, against the man, usually of limited means, who tills the ground and raises his small amount of cotton, either on his own farm or as a tenant, and if he does perchance get a considerable profit now from his crop he is not nearly as strong as the cotton-mill men; I wish to see them prosper. But I do long to see the cotton growers, and especially the small farmer with his little farm, get ahead now on a good price for cotton. The condition of cotton, the cost of its production, the world's supply, and the world's demand combine to justify a price twice that for which sales were made before the war. Give the cotton farmer a square deal and let him have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have listened with much pleasure and a good deal of profit to what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has just said. It has come at a psychological moment, was very clearly expressed, and very abundantly fortified logically, and I merely want to add a little bit to it.

In the first place, I want to ask to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Boston Evening Transcript of August 15, 1917, entitled "Why not a cotton embargo?" This was sent me by Alexander W. Murray, of Boston. This will show what the abuses were by the neutral nations in the use of the cotton that they pretendedly imported from us for their own use in 1914, 1915, and part of 1916—only a part of the last-named year. The evidence is overwhelming that under the guise and pretense of getting cotton for themselves they were at that time getting cotton for German use in the manufacture of high explosives as well as of cloth in German mills. After that, I want to ask, as a part of the same presentation of the case, to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of yesterday entitled "Embargoes and cotton."

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Editorial from the Boston Evening Transcript, Aug. 15, 1917.]

WHY NOT A COTTON EMBARGO?

Current statistics seriously suggest the desirability, if not the necessity, of placing at least a partial embargo upon exports of cotton to neutral countries. It is well known that cotton is one of the most important and practically indispensable ingredients of some of the high explosives used in war; wherefore it may properly be classed as conditional contraband. Germany does not herself produce it, and is thus dependent upon imports from other countries. That she has been thus far receiving her supplies largely from America is perfectly obvious. That she should continue thus to get her supplies from us while we are at war with her would be a disgraceful anomaly.

The facts in the case are these: Holland in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the year immediately preceding the war, purchased from the United States a little more than 17,500,000 pounds of cotton, which was presumably all she wanted to supply her own wants. In the next year, 1915, she purchased nearly 262,000,000 pounds, or nearly fifteen times as much as in the preceding year. It would be trifling with sound sense to assume that there was any such increase in the domestic needs of Holland. That enormous increase was destined for Germany, and out of it she manufactured thousands of tons of lethal ammunition. The next year Great Britain interfered with that trade to such an extent that it was cut down to 51,000,000 pounds, or still nearly three times what it was before the war. In the first eight months of the last fiscal year it was more than 30,000,000 pounds.

Similar transactions occurred with other neutral countries. In the year before the war Denmark took only 52,040 pounds of our cotton. In the next year she took nearly 19,500,000 pounds, or three hundred and seventy-five times as much. It would overtax credulity to believe that her own needs increased three hundred and seventy-fivefold. In the fiscal year 1916 her quota was reduced to 5,977,970 pounds, or more than a hundred times what it was before the war. In the first eight months of the last fiscal year she got none at all, thanks to the British fleet. Norway in 1914 got 1,877,670 pounds, and in 1915 increased the amount to 29,947,098. In 1916 it was reduced to 8,291,625, and in the first eight months of 1917 to 4,900,300. Sweden took 25,835,256 pounds in 1914, and increased the amount to 391,520,343 in 1915. In 1916 she was forced down to a normal quantity, 30,254,928 pounds, but in the first eight months of 1917 she got 43,244,124 pounds.

Nor is Italy, one of the allied belligerents, free from reproach. In the fiscal year 1914 she took 268,678,515 pounds. In 1915 she took 563,700,142, or more than twice as much. In 1916 the amount declined to 418,457,552, and in 1917 to 402,500,000 pounds. Now, Italy has in all only about 4,600,000 cotton spindles, and these, for lack of fuel, are being operated to only half of their capacity, so that it is quite impossible that she should need so much cotton. In fact, Italian officials admit that a large part of her purchases of cotton is resold to Switzerland. But Switzerland has only 1,500,000 spindles, most of which are idle for lack of fuel, so that she surely can not use any considerable quantity of cotton, and we are thus driven to the conclusion that much that is shipped to Italy finds its way through Switzerland to Germany.

It is high time for all such traffic to be stopped. We do not want to send soldiers to the war front to fight Germany, and at the same time, directly or indirectly, to send cotton to Germany with which to make explosives to kill them. It is said that an embargo is not placed upon cotton because the Government does not want to interfere with the prosperity of the South. We should hate to believe that true. We should hate to think that the South, for the sake of a little higher price for her cotton, was willing to supply our enemy with munitions of war with which to torpedo our ships and slaughter our men. If that were true, it would be one of the most appalling indictments of the South that ever was made.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 12, 1917.]

EMBARGOES AND COTTON.

With commendable promptitude the Department of Agriculture has made public an analysis of cotton exports in recent years for the purpose of controverting a statement given circulation to the effect that the so-called embargo on cotton to neutrals would cut off the market for 4,000,000 bales.

The department's report shows that last year's exports of cotton to all countries other than France, Italy, Russia, England, Canada, and Japan amounted to only 722,134 bales. Moreover, as pointed out in the statement, the terms of the so-called embargo do not cut off absolutely the neutral markets. The President's proclamation leaves ample room for modifications or entire exemptions of the rulings at such time and to such countries as may seem advisable and proper. In addition to this, the department report shows, through a study of last year's trade and an estimate of this year's movements, that if present conditions of war and transportation continue the supply of cotton is well within the world's demand and that the embargo will not materially affect the movement of exports.

In all probability the erroneous statement referred to was spread for market effects. The department report hints as much in its comment that "it is painful to observe that there are American citizens who for gain or in prejudice would distort the truth in regard to the regulation of cotton exports to neutrals."

It would not be fair to the South to admit that the corrective report could have been issued for any other purpose than to check misleading rumors and set the southern cotton grower at ease as to the actual effect of the embargo.

But if the curtailment of exports to neutrals should affect cotton, what of it? Hundreds of articles of American production and manufacture are included in the ban together with the great staple of the South, and in modern munitions making cotton is as essential an ingredient as steel or copper. There is no question remaining of the character of the traffic which the neutrals have been carrying on with Germany through transshipments of supplies from the United States.

The embargo recently imposed is to bring to an end this form of aid and comfort to the enemy. Every section of the country will patriotically respond to any measures calculated to achieve this result, at whatever passing sacrifice or loss. It is an act of wisdom on the part of the Government, nevertheless, to make clear to the South that there is no call for a let-up in the production of its most important staple. As the department states, "from these facts it would appear that a crop of 12,500,000 or even 13,000,000 bales this year will not exceed the world's eager demand unless some unforeseen calamity should befall."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as the senior Senator from Georgia has just said, Great Britain has already to a very great extent put a stop to the abuses which existed in 1914, 1915, and a part of 1916. It has been gotten down to about where Spain, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries all put together are getting only a little above 500,000 bales, if the last several months is to be a good index for the year, while only a little over 300,000 bales have gone into Holland and the Scandinavian countries, whence the fraud could be perpetrated of sending them on into Germany. The abuse is already largely stopped, but our embargo will prevent altogether any of our cotton being made into explosives by Germany to kill or maim our boys in the trenches. The justification for it is absolutely unanswerable. It will stop for the most part even the present slight abuse taking place chiefly through Sweden and partially through Holland and Denmark; very little, if any, now through Switzerland.

The stoppage of that amount of cotton ought to have no effect whatsoever upon the market. It has had a slight effect, because speculators have used the very word "embargo" for the purpose of hammering down the market somewhat, and did hammer it down—the future market, especially. The effort to make it appear that the embargo ought to have some effect upon the prices is only a part of a speculative movement upon one side, and, upon the other side, is a part of a constant and organized effort to cripple and hamper all the war measures of this Government—an organized effort which has existed for quite a while.

As far as the slight amount of cotton going to Holland and the Scandinavian countries is concerned, if every bale of it were stopped to-day, more than that amount of cotton would be used in addition to what is being used now for the increased manufacture of high explosives for the allies and for ourselves.

I am very glad, indeed, that the senior Senator from Georgia took the psychological moment to make his remarks, and I know they will do a great deal of good where doing good is needed in the way of disarming prejudice and furnishing information.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask either the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Georgia a question in regard to this editorial from the Boston Transcript that the Senator from Mississippi has placed in the Record. I have a copy of it in my hand.

I was very glad that the Senator from Georgia said what he did, because I have read this editorial. I suppose it has been given very wide circulation. If the Senator's figures are right—and of course I do not question them—this editorial is wrong. I did not intend to mention it, but since the Senator has put it in the Record I should like to call the attention of these two Senators to some of those figures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say that those figures are right, and the figures given by the Senator from Georgia are right. The editorial in the Boston Transcript, if you will read it, is referring to a period antedating the period to which the Senator from Georgia is referring.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I wanted the Senator to clear up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One of the objects of that letter, I think—now, I do not know; I do not know who wrote the editorial; I do not know whence it sprang or what the source was; but whether it was one of its objects or not, it impressed me as calculated to be used to depress the cotton market and to leave the impression that those amounts of cotton were going now, whereas they are the amounts that went months ago or a year ago.

Mr. NORRIS. The editorial says in so many words that there are lots of cotton now going into Germany, and pretends to give some figures. Now, I want to read to the Senate just some of them. It says here that Sweden took 25,835,256 pounds in 1914, and that in the first eight months of 1917—that is, this year—she took 43,244,124 pounds; almost twice as much in the first eight months of this year as she took in an entire year before the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The difference between 25,000,000 and 43,000,000 would be only about 18,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. But there is only eight months in the larger figure, and there is 12 months in the smaller figure, before the war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator that since April 1, 1916, Sweden could not obtain more than 9,000 bales a month; that was the amount fixed by Great Britain; that Great Britain first permitted the Swedish Cotton Spinners' Association to receive 10,000 bales by agreement of June 3, 1915, but on April 1, 1916, this was reduced to 9,000 bales a month. So the limit of cotton which Sweden can receive under this action of Great Britain is 108,000 bales a year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator read the figures of 1916, he would notice a drop, and then there was a slight rise in 1917.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there was a drop. The total was forced down in 1916 to something over 30,000,000 pounds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But the figures for the first eight months of 1917 were the ones that impressed me. I judge from what the Senator from Georgia says that they must be wrong, because there was for 8 months after the war, 8 months of the present year, as compared with 12 months before the war, an increase from 25,000,000 to 43,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of what—pounds, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Pounds; yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Georgia was giving the amounts in bales.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; but I have given the amounts in both instances in pounds. I have given them from this editorial that the Senator has already placed in the Record.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know; but the Senator from Georgia gave the amounts in bales. A bale of cotton is 500 pounds.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I understand that; but the figures that this editorial gives for the year before the war are in pounds, the same as the figures for the eight months of the present year are in pounds; and the figures for the eight months are 43,000,000, while the figures for the whole year before the war were only 25,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Nebraska is asking about, of course in all these neutral countries there has been some slight legitimate increase in the use of cotton, because they were cut off from their usual purchases of German cotton goods. Most of these people bought cotton goods from Germany in large quantities. Now they have had to manufacture those goods for themselves or else import them from Great Britain or the United States, so that there was room for a slight legitimate increase in the use of cotton. The increase that the Senator calls attention to is slight; but whatever may be the reason of the fall in 1916 and the rise in 1917—which I confess I do not quite understand—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a mistake. There was no rise in 1917. There was a fall in 1917.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, it may be a mistake.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I got the exact figures from the Agricultural Department and from the State Department and a copy of the British contract.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt the Senator's figures are correct. I would not have called attention to this matter if it had not been that the Senator from Mississippi had placed this editorial in the Record. It seems to me the figures must be wrong, and it is not only with Sweden that this editorial goes into some detail. It charges here, almost in so many words, that there is cotton going into Italy that Italy permits to go through Switzerland into Austria.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not charge that Italy "permits" it. It says some cotton goods get across the border in Switzerland; but it is not charged that it is with the connivance of the Italian Government. I suppose it happens in the usual way that smuggling occurs.

Mr. NORRIS. In reference to increasing the market it is claimed here that in both Italy and Switzerland the spindles are not operated to their full capacity for the reason that there is a lack of coal; they have not the fuel. It says, for instance, that the Italian officials admit that a large part of their purchases of cotton is resold to Switzerland, and "Switzerland has only 1,500,000 spindles, most of which are idle for lack of fuel."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me reply that the officials utterly repudiate the statement as absolutely false. The Italian minister gave out an interview repudiating it as false. Italy does not let any considerable amount go to Switzerland. It is entirely supervised by the British ambassador and the British consuls and by the French commission. I have in my hand a letter from the State Department confirming my statement. I have here a letter from our ambassador at Rome confirming it, and a letter from the English ambassador to Mr. Page confirming it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad to hear the Senator. In fact, I listened to him with a great deal of interest. As I said, I am not questioning his figures. They seem to be perfectly authoritative and are undoubtedly right. I have not looked it up, but I read this editorial, and it seems to me it shows on its face, since the Senator has put the figures in the Record, that it is erroneous. I did not want the editorial to go in the Record without having that specifically brought to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish also to add with reference to the shipments this year that I hold the bulletin of the Department of Commerce in my hand which shows that only 57,915 bales of cotton during the first six months of 1917 went to Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden combined. Those are the exact figures from the Department of Commerce, giving the totals for the four countries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not care whether the figures given in the editorial of the Boston Transcript are perfectly accurate or not, they reflect the state of affairs that did exist, to wit, that cotton was going through neutral countries to Germany to be used in German manufactures for clothing her army or in German manufactures for high explosives to kill her enemies. The object of introducing it was merely to show what the abuse had been, so as to justify the use of the embargo in order to stop it. However gentlemen may talk about the exact figures, it is undoubtedly true that in 1914 and 1915 and a part of 1916 that was taking place. It was taking place up to the time when the British blockade came into active operation and orders in council were issued and even after that until the machinery could be put into execution. That was my object of introducing the editorial, and I have no reason to think that the figures are very far wrong, if at all.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business 92, Senate bill 2489, and to consider bills to which there is no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that we are to begin where we left off.

Mr. SMOOT. That is where we left off, at Senate bill 2489.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 2489) to create two additional associate justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia was announced as first in order upon the calendar, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional associate justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; that said additional associate justices shall have the same power, authority, and jurisdiction as now or hereafter may be exercised by any of the associate justices of the said supreme court, and shall be entitled to receive the same salary, payable in the same manner.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHAPLAINS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The bill (S. 2527) authorizing appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President alone may appoint for the period of the existing emergency not exceeding 20 chaplains at large for the United States Army, 12 as representing religious sects not recognized in the apportionment of chaplains now provided by law, and 8 for service in base hospitals, and such number of chaplains as he may determine to be necessary for service at training camps, cantonments, recruit depots, and in the National Army, selected from prominent clergy and ministers who have served at the front with the allied armies, but who have passed the age limit prescribed by law for appointment in the Regular Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 101, directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish copies of the official dispatches upon which was based the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Public Information in regard to the encounter of the American fleet with submarines, together with other information about said Committee on Public Information.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Mr. PENROSE subsequently said: What became of Senate resolution 101?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It went over under objection.

Mr. PENROSE. May I ask who objected?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS AND ENTRYMEN.

The bill (S. 2334) to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the pendency of the existing war any homestead settler or entryman shall be entitled to a leave of absence from his land for the purpose of performing farm labor, and such absence, while actually engaged in farm labor, shall, upon compliance with the terms of this act, be counted as constructive residence: Provided, That each settler or entryman leaving his claim for the purpose herein provided shall file notice thereof in the United States Land Office, and at the expiration of the calendar year file in said land office of the district wherein his claim is situated a written statement, under oath and corroborated by two witnesses, giving the date or dates when he left his claim, date or dates of return thereto, and where and for whom he was engaged in farm labor during such period or periods of absence: Provided further, That nothing herein shall excuse any homestead settler or entryman from making improvements or performing the cultivation required by applicable law upon his claim or entry. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to provide rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 109, to discharge the Committee on Woman Suffrage from the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

FREDERICK W. COBB.

The bill (S. 82) to transfer Frederick W. Cobb from the list of chief machinists, United States Navy, to the list of chief pay clerks, United States Navy, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask if anyone present can explain this bill. I will ask that it go over temporarily, and I shall read the report and see if I can get the information from it.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Alabama was anxious to have the bill come up, but he is not present now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish, in this connection, to suggest that if we should take off of the calendar dead matter or doubtful matter as we go through and transfer it to Rule IX and get it out of our way it would help greatly in handling the calendar. I think from this on if I am present at the call I shall make that request as to all doubtful matter, probably dead matter. It does not kill it to put it under Rule IX, and if you get it there by mistake and it is alive or the friends of the measure want to really press it they can call it up. It takes it out of our way when we put it under Rule IX, and it should go there unless there is real life in it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the policy has been to do that when a Senator was present who was interested in the measure, but never to request it in his absence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That can be done when a Senator indicates to us that something has life in it, but if it seems to be dead, I think I will ask that it go under Rule IX hereafter, anyhow.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is right in the position he has just taken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We ought to prepare to clean up the calendar and keep it a real working calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice from the report of the Secretary of the Navy that he recommends that Senate bill 82 be reported favorably, and therefore I shall not object to its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment after the word "Provided," in line 6, to strike out the words "That this shall not result in any increase or loss in pay he is now receiving or which he would be entitled to receive," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Frederick W. Cobb, now a chief machinist, United States Navy, to be a chief pay clerk, United States Navy: Provided, That he shall be placed at the foot of the list of chief pay clerks as it exists on the date of the passage of this act: Provided further, That he shall receive the same pay as chief pay clerk of like rank and length of commissioned service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

The next business on the calendar was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) providing for the appointment of a joint committee to be known as the joint committee on the conduct of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

RECOMMISSIONING OF OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 2746) to authorize the recommissioning of former officers of the Regular Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to recommission, upon physical examination and such mental examination as the Secretary of War shall direct, any person who has served four or more years as a commissioned officer in the Regular Army, who was in good standing at the time of his resignation, and who left the Regular Army not more than five years prior to the passage of this act, to take rank at the foot of the lineal list in the grade which he would have attained in the arm of the service to which he was assigned had he not left the service: Provided, however, That the authority hereby vested in the President to recommission under the provisions of this act is limited to the duration of the present war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECENT TROUBLES IN EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

The next business on the calendar was Senate concurrent resolution 10, authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to investigate the causes of the recent riots in East St. Louis, Ill., and to report thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that had better go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

ELECTIONS IN TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

The bill (S. 2380) granting to the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualifications of electors, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii be, and it is hereby, vested with the power to provide that, in all elections authorized to be held by the organic act of the Territory of Hawaii, female citizens possessing the same qualifications as male citizens shall be entitled to vote.

SEC. 2. That the said legislature is further hereby vested with the power to have submitted to the voters of the Territory of Hawaii the question of whether or not the female citizens of the Territory shall be empowered to vote at elections held under the laws of the Territory of Hawaii.

SEC. 3. That all provisions of the organic act of the Territory of Hawaii restricting the right to vote to male citizens which are in conflict with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect and be enforced from and after its approval, and shall be held to apply to both Territorial and municipal elections.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAMPAIGN BADGES FOR DENTAL CORPS.

The bill (S. 2701) to provide for the awarding of campaign badges to the members of the Dental Corps, United States Army, and fixing the regulations for awarding same, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War shall issue campaign badges to the members of the Dental Corps, United States Army, under the same conditions, rules, and regulations which govern the issuance of said badges to members of the Medical Corps, United States Army.

SEC. 2. That in computing the nature of service and length of duration of said service for making the award of said badges to the members of the said Dental Corps, United States Army, the time said members have served under contract as well as under commission shall be included and form the basis for making the awards of said campaign badges.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF EXPORT TRADE.

The bill (H. R. 2316) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. That bill was put over—

Mr. PHELAN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The bill (S. 2660) amending the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918," was next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. The provision in this bill, I believe, was incorporated in the revenue bill that was just passed. Therefore I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

STOCK-GRAZING HOMESTEADS.

The bill (S. 2776) providing for the classification of lands under the stock-grazing homestead act in certain States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HUSTING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

COAL AND PHOSPHATE MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

COLORADO RIVER AND IMPERIAL VALLEY, CAL.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 127, to print the manuscript entitled "Colorado River in its Relation to the Imperial Valley, Cal.," as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

LAND AND NAVAL FORCES.

The bill (S. 2717) prescribing rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces during the period of the existing war with Germany was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. That is an adverse report.

Mr. FLETCHER. It ought to go over. Neither the Senator who introduced it nor the Senator who reported it is here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

STOCK-GRAZING HOMESTEADS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As the call of the calendar has been concluded, I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. 2776) providing for the classification of lands under the stock-grazing homestead act in certain States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUSTING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	New	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brady	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Sterling
Culberson	Kendrick	Poinexter	Swanson
Curtis	La Follette	Pomerene	Tammell
Fall	Lodge	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fletcher	Martin	Shafroth	Williams
Harding	Myers	Sheppard

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is necessarily detained.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Georgia in the Chair). Thirty-five Senators have answered to their names. No quorum is present.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 14, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 13, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the finer and more delicate qualities of soul, which in times of danger, distress and sorrow lift us above the sordid and make the whole world akin; illustrated by the work of the Red Cross and other philanthropic organizations, whose humane work is going out to relieve the suffering and sorrowing in all the world.

Sanctify the work of the Congress in its efforts to protect the men who are going forth to sacrifice their lives, it may be, upon the altar of Liberty. Grant, O most merciful Father, that out of it all may come a larger civilization which shall lift mankind into a realm of peace and liberty, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all the earth, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5723, the war-risk insurance bill, and, pending that, I would like to submit a request for unanimous consent. I would like to see if we can not agree on closing the debate this afternoon in order to finish this bill. Can we not agree that at 5 o'clock we read the remaining portions of the bill, without further debate, and that the amendments be offered and voted on?

Mr. ESCH. I suggest that we not make that proposition until possibly 3 o'clock or half past 3, and see what progress we make in the meantime. I want to expedite the bill as much as possible.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will not insist on the request now. We made pretty good progress yesterday, and we may get along all right to-day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5723, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5723, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it. We wish to try to finish this bill to-day.

Mr. BLACK. We have an important amendment here. However, I will withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, where is that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. On page 17, line 12.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that amendment will not be adopted, and if it is I will propose another amendment, that the marriage shall be limited to a period of not more than 10 years after the disability, in harmony with the suggestion made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]; but it does seem wrong to me that these boys who will come home and may have an arm off or a leg off may not marry except under penalty, and if they do marry their wives will be cut off from the benefits intended to be conferred by this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment that is being voted upon reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 12, after the word "If," insert the words "from a marriage contracted before injury."

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a motion, unless the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will make it. He suggested that we withdraw "from a marriage contracted within 10 years after the injury." I move the insertion of those words.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another committee amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I beg your pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 22, after the word "continue," strike out the words "two years after her remarriage or"; and after the word "death," in line 23, insert the words "or remarriage."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be recognized. I do not want to throw any "sob stuff" into this discussion, but I feel like it is my duty to call attention to the discrimination against the lack of regard for justice to, parents of soldiers shown by the eminent sociologists who wrote this bill.

Under this article the helpless, destitute, and dependent father of the soldier who loses his life on the battle field will not receive a solitary penny, but will have to go to the poorhouse. That is the situation under this bill as it now stands. The gentle-souled sociologists, whom I love so much, are usually rather sentimental fellows and are usually given to indulging human emotions, but it seems when they strike the note that bears upon the sacred relations between the parent and child their emotions drop dead and they fall back on the cold, hard basis of the public welfare and rest on it alone.

Of course, everybody expects a father to be soaked. Poor, old "father." Of course, he is entitled to no recognition, he has no rights that anyone is bound to respect. The fact that he has loved his boy and toiled and sweated to raise him and school him as a staff and support in his old age, all that is nothing, of course. But who would have expected these public-minded sociologists to soak poor old "mother" as well? Yet we find that "mother" has been discriminated against throughout this bill in favor of the wife. Not only has she who went down into the valley of the shadow of death to give existence and life to the soldier, not only is that heroic creature to be made second to the wife whom he has chosen, but she is made to be second to the wife whom he has discarded and obtained a divorce from. Under the provisions of this bill there is no obligatory allotment for the support of a destitute and dependent mother. Not only are they going to leave the destitute and dependent mother, perhaps sick and bedridden, without a single cent of obligatory allotment, but they prefer the divorced wife over her and require the soldier to support her even though he does nothing for his mother.

Further, when we come to this provision of the bill we find that the minimum for a widow is $30, whereas the minimum for the soldier's mother is $25. That same principle runs through every benefit that is given by this bill when the respective rights of wives and mothers are considered.

Now, I do not know what is the basis of discrimination. I am not a sociologist myself. I can not tell you. Perhaps somebody can explain how it is that a mother, destitute and dependent, should have less for her support than a wife. Somebody may be able to do that. The only reason I can conceive is that the mother is older and perhaps would not eat as much as the wife, and therefore they would make the amount $5 per month less for the mother. But that does not take into account the fact that the wife will probably be better able to work and earn her own living than the helpless mother. That is not considered at all. That is a matter of sentiment. I do not know why they did it. Perhaps some sociologist may be able to explain.

They that have done this deed are honorable.

What private griefs they have, alas, I know not.

That made them do it; they are wise and honorable,

And will, no doubt, with reasons answer you.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ALEXANDER. At the end of section 301 I desire to offer the following amendment:

The word "widow" as used in this section shall include only one who shall have married the deceased within 10 years after the time of the injury.

That is in line of the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: At the end of section 301, on page 19, insert the following: "The word 'widow' as used in this section shall include only one who shall have married the deceased within 10 years after the time of the injury."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, that covers the question of a widow, but it does not cover the question of the children. If the gentleman will put it in as I proposed, he would have said "from a marriage contracted within 10 years after the time of the injury."

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am unable to hear what the gentleman says.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Chair suggests that progress will be made more rapidly if the committee will be good enough to be in order. If gentlemen desire to converse, they will retire from the room to carry on their conversations, and that will expedite the progress of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman desire to return to another provision?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] had the floor and has yielded to the gentleman from New Jersey for a question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I thought that the gentleman from Missouri desired to change the words that were in there before, "if from a marriage contracted before the injury the deceased leaves a widow or child," so that it will read: "If from a marriage contracted within 10 years after the injury the deceased leaves a widow or child."

Now, the difficulty of the gentleman's amendment is that it will apply only to the widow, so that a widow who was married after 10 years will get no pension, but it will not apply to her child, even if she marries 30 years afterwards. I do not know what the gentleman desires about it. I suggest an easy way to do it, and will offer a substitute for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman may offer it. We have the same purpose in view.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the Alexander amendment, offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 17, line 12, after the word "If" insert "from a marriage contracted within 10 years after the injury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have nothing to say, except that I do not want to have a pension granted of $2,000 a year in the case of a major general to some young woman who has married him 40 years after the injury was incurred.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is suggested that it be made to read, "a marriage contracted before 10 years after the injury."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey will be modified as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws his amendment. Of course, that withdraws the substitute.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I offer my amendment as an original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 17, line 12, after the word "If" insert "from a marriage contracted before 10 years after the injury."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] is recognized on the amendment.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment as I would have opposed the committee amendment for which it is offered as a substitute. There is a considerable attempt in this bill to mislead the people. It is heralded to the country as being more liberal than the existing law.

And when we point out that the pension of the soldier has been chopped down all the way along the line, from the blind to the man who is drawing perhaps $2 or $3 or $4 a month, the answer is that this bill is more liberal to the widows of the soldiers. With this amendment in the bill, which it seems the members of the committee are willing to accept, I deny that it is as liberal to the widows of the soldiers of this and succeeding wars as the existing law. See what that first amendment would have done. The existing law is that if a man contracts disease in the service or receives an injury in the service and dies therefrom, although he may have married a woman 50 years after the war, she receives the pension as his widow. How many of the boys going into this army will have wives before the contracting of the disease or the occurrence of the injury from which they must die in order that the widow shall have a pension? Most of them will not be married until after they return from their army service, and thus their widows would receive no pension. I say that existing law would take twice as much money out of the Treasury. Although widows would receive only $12 a month, there would be probably four or five times as many widows who would be pensioned.

Now, gentlemen, it is proposed to put on another limit. A 10-year limit is proposed. Why put on any? The 1,200,000 soldiers have gone into this army with the law so and so. That gives their widows pensions, whether they marry 10, 20, 30, or 40 years after they come back. That is the existing law.

Mr. McKENZIE. With reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], is it not a fact that if that amendment is adopted a soldier would have to be crippled or injured 10 years before he got married?

Mr. SWITZER. Why, certainly. The gentleman from Alabama pointed out the case of the mother and father. Of course, gentlemen, you can give widows higher pensions if you cut down the number of widows. That is very easy. You can put on a limit of five years before the war, and you can run the pensions up to $60 a month, and claim that you are giving the widows of soldiers more liberal treatment, but how many will receive any compensation or any pension? It is just the old shell game, now you see it and now you do not see it. That is all there is to this proposition. Why, my friends, before you revolutionize a statute that has been on the books for years and years, before you change so materially this pension law that has been thought out in the past and that has been perfected as the years have gone by for the benefit of the soldiers and their widows and dependents, you had better stop and think, you had better investigate and make some computation to see which is the more liberal, which is the more humane. Should not the widow of the soldier who comes back with one leg and marries 11 years after the war and dies from disability incurred in service be entitled to a pension as much as the widow who marries a one-legged or one-armed soldier within 10 years after the termination of that war? What reason can you give for that discrimination?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, my amendment that I offered is not very plain, and therefore, yielding to the suggestion of gentlemen about me, I have put it in absolutely plain language. I ask unanimous consent to modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by suggesting the language which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 17, line 12, after the word "If" insert the words "from a marriage contracted before or within 10 years after the injury."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the reading of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us have it read again.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Moon having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore,

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution to draft certain aliens into the military service of the United States, and for other purposes;

S. 2705. An act to create the aircraft board, and provide for its maintenance;

S. 2816. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Gainesville Red River Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across Red River;

S. 2813. An act to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the bay and Blakely Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.;

S. 2796. An act to permit American citizens to wear medals and decorations received from certain foreign countries on entering the military or naval service of the United States, and for other purposes; and

S. 2774. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Gilmer-Pittsburgh Coal Co. to construct a bridge across the Little Kanawha River.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as read.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SWITZER and Mr. REAVIS demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 16.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will reach what he desires by demanding tellers.

Mr. REAVIS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused, not a sufficient number seconding the demand.

Mr. REAVIS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REAVIS. Is it within the rule for me to make the point of order of no quorum on the vote on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee was dividing. If the gentleman makes the point of no quorum, of course he can have a roll call, but the result will be this, that if the point of no quorum was made while the committee was dividing and before the result was announced, upon the presence of a quorum being determined the vote will be taken again.

Mr. REAVIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DOWELL. What the gentleman is trying to get is a roll call—

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman will try to state it himself without assistance.

Mr. ADAMSON. He can not have a roll call on the motion.

Mr. DOWELL. He is not entitled to it.

Mr. ADAMSON. He can not get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska will proceed with his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. REAVIS. What I am trying to ascertain is this: I want if possible to get a vote upon this amendment by a quorum of the committee, and I made the point of order under the impression that if a quorum were not present we would be entitled to a vote upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean a roll call vote?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; that was my purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman can get that in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Answering the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry, there could not be a roll call upon the amendment in the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. We can have that in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can get that under the rule. Does the gentleman from Nebraska make the point of no quorum?

Mr. REAVIS. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. On this vote the ayes are 57 and the noes 16, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLACK: In lines 17 and 18, page 17, after the word "alone," on line 17, strike out the words "25 per cent, but not less than $30," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$35," so that subdivision (a) as amended will read: "(a) For a widow alone, $35."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the whole amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Technically, what has been read by the Clerk would be the first amendment. Does the gentleman from Texas ask unanimous consent that the series of amendments that he gave notice yesterday afternoon he would offer may be reported and considered as one amendment?

Mr. BLACK. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk continued to read, as follows:

Also, in lines 19 and 20, after the word "child," in line 19, on page 17, strike out the words "35 per cent, but not less than $40," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$45," so that subdivision (b) as amended will read: "(b) For a widow and one child, $45."

Also, in lines 21, 22, and 23, after the word "children," in line 21, on page 17, strike out the words "40 per cent, but not less than $50, 5 per cent additional, but not less than," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$52.50," so that subdivision (c) as amended will read: "(c) For a widow and two children, $52.50, with $5 for each additional child up to two."

Also, in lines 24 and 25, after the word "child," in line 24, on page 17, strike out the words "20 per cent, but not less than $15," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$20," so that subdivision (d) as amended will read: "(d) If there be no widow, then for one child, $20."

Also, in lines 1 and 2, page 18, after the word "children," in line 1, on page 18, strike out the words "30 per cent, but not less than $25," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$35," so that subdivision (e) as amended will read: "(e) For two children, $35."

Also, in lines 3 and 4, page 18, after the word "children," in line 3, on page 18, strike out the words "40 per cent, but not less than $35, 5 per cent additional, but not less than," and insert in lieu of the language stricken out the figures "$45," so that subdivision (f) as amended will read: "(f) For three children, $45, with $10 for each additional child up to two."

Also, in lines 6 and 7, on page 18, after the word "mother," in line 6, strike out the words "20 per cent, but not less than $25," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$30"; and in lines 10 and 11, on page 18, after the word "exceed," in line 10, strike out the words "50 per cent of the pay, or $60, whichever is the greater," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$75," so that subdivision (g) as amended will read: "(g) For a widowed mother, $30. The amount payable under this subdivision shall not be greater than a sum which when added to the total amount payable to the widow and children does not exceed $75. This compensation shall be payable for the death of but one child, and no compensation for the death of a child shall be payable if such widowed mother is in receipt of compensation under the provisions of this article for the death of her husband."

Also strike out all of lines 16 and 17 on page 18.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if we could not fix some time for debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. BLACK. I shall want 10 minutes on my amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to offer a substitute and would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that there will be about 30 minutes asked for by those in favor of the amendment. If we can get that time to be controlled by me in favor of the amendment, it will be sufficient.

Mr. KEATING. This is one of the most important sections of the bill.

Mr. IGOE. I have an amendment to the section that I want five minutes upon.

Mr. ESCH. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that we want 35 minutes on this side.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 70 minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin to control the time over there and I to control the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 70 minutes, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and the other half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, probably that would make the time controlled by two gentlemen both opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if the gentleman would not fix a time for this amendment alone, because there are other important amendments to this section.

Mr. RAYBURN. I thought I had made allowance for everybody who wanted to offer an amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Take the matter of the omission of the father from the benefits of this section.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have considered everybody that has suggested they wanted time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think that others have the same idea. I was going to suggest that there was another aspect, and that is that the mother can not get a pension under the bill unless she is dependent.

Mr. RAYBURN. Has the gentleman an amendment?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Some one will offer it if I do not, and I think 20 minutes, in addition to the time requested, ought to be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object.

Mr. RAYBURN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 70 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion will not be in order until the amendment has been debated. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, it would be impossible for me to explain this amendment which I have offered in 5 minutes, and so I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he use five minutes and then allow the gentleman from Texas Mr. [RAYBURN] to make his motion.

Mr. BLACK. Very well. Now, gentlemen of the House, I do not desire to enter into any preliminary discussion on the amendment but to get right down to the question of what the amendment is designed to do. I explained on the floor of the House last Tuesday that section 301 of article 3 seeks to introduce a new policy on the part of the United States Government in regard to the payment of death benefits to the wives and children and other dependent relatives of the soldier or sailor who is killed while in the line of duty or dies from a disease contracted while in the service.

The purpose of my amendment is to remove distinctions and discriminations from the benefits conferred by the bill and will be illustrated by taking up subdivision (c), on page 17, of the pending bill. That subdivision as it now reads is as follows:

(c) For a widow and two children, 40 per cent but not less than $50, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $5, for each additional child up to two.

If my amendment is adopted, then subdivision (c) would read as follows:

(c) For a widow and two children, $52.50, with $5 for each additional child up to two.

In the remarks I made last Tuesday I took up subdivision (a) and illustrated these discriminatory features by comparing the different benefits which would accrue under that subdivision, and now, in order that I may not repeat the comparisons which I made last Tuesday, I will take up subdivision (c) as it now appears in the bill. This comparison I am sure will be sufficient to convince any Member of the House that this bill should not pass in its present form.

Let us take the case of a private, a captain, a colonel, and a brigadier general, and suppose that each is killed in line of duty or dies from disease contracted in the service. Each one leaves a widow and two children. What will these beneficiaries receive under subdivision (c) as now written in the bill? Here is the answer: The widow and two children of the private will receive the sum of $50 per month. The captain's widow and his two children will receive the sum of $80 per month. The widow and two children of the colonel will receive $133.33 a month, and the widow and two children of the brigadier general will receive the sum of $200 a month. Now, then, when we go home and are asked the question as to why we make that distinction, what answer are we going to make? In fact, is there any answer that we could make which would be worthy of acceptance?

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. BLACK. I can not yield now, because I have only five minutes. I will yield later.

Now, proceeding further along the same line which I was pursuing when interrupted, can we say to them that any deduction of pay is made from the salary or pay of the private soldier or captain, of the colonel or the brigadier general, to serve as a basis for these differences and discriminations? Not at all, because there is no deduction of pay for these benefits, and they are conferred by the United States Government without charge. What are the values of these benefits measured in insurance values? The answer is this: The private who has a wife and two children would have a policy from the United States Government equal to the sum of $10,000, payable on the monthly installment plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer a substitute—

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I wondered if we could not arrange for closing debate on this. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 70 minutes, half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Esch] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall be closed in 70 minutes, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Esch]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will withhold that for a minute. This is a very important section.

Mr. RAYBURN. I realize that, and that is the reason I am giving so much time.

Mr. BLANTON. And I hope he will permit me to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am going to give him the time, if I can get this consent.

Mr. BLANTON. I think he ought to have 10 minutes on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he will not make some provision for other amendments to this section?

Mr. RAYBURN. They can be offered.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But not debated within this time you have allotted. It has already been taken up by requests of gentlemen on this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman modify his request and confine it to this amendment and amendments already offered? There are some important amendments to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 70 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 70 minutes.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is not debatable.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is it understood the time is to be equally divided between the two gentlemen?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a substitute—

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; there was no such understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion did not include that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think the gentleman omitted that, and I would like for the Chair to put the other part of the motion, that the time be controlled by the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Wisconsin equally.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will control the time under that. I ask unanimous consent that half the time be controlled by myself—

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object.

Mr. RAYBURN. And the other half to be controlled by the gentleman—

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. RAYBURN. I thought I put it in the motion and that it was understood by everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. That would have destroyed the privileged character of the motion if it had been entertained. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, as I was proceeding to say when my time expired, the benefits that would be given to the dependents of the private soldier really amount in effect to insurance of the value of $10,000. That which would be given in the case of a captain would be $16,000 or $17,000; that which would be given in the case of a colonel would be equal to a policy of $25,000, and that which would be given in the case of a brigadier general would be equal in effect to a policy of insurance of $35,000. Fully that much, and possibly more. I am not an insurance actuary and therefore not an expert, but my figures are substantially correct. Now, I say, how are we going to justify a law of that kind? I have no disposition to discuss at this time the differences of pay between officers in our Army and Navy and our private soldiers and sailors. That subject is not up for discussion. Our officers are generously paid as compared to those of other nations, and our private soldiers and sailors are paid liberally as compared with the private soldiers and sailors of any other nation in the world. So far as I know, the Dominion of Canada and Australia are the only other countries whose schedule of pay to officers and enlisted men is comparable to our own.

I have no quarrel to make as to the pay which our officers and enlisted men are receiving. No, not a bit of it, but are we going to pursue this distinction of pay beyond the borders of the grave? That, gentlemen, is the question that now squarely confronts you. I thought that surely if there was any country in the world where the burning words of John J. Ingalls were applicable, it was in this great Republic of ours:

In the democracy of the grave all men at last are equal. There is neither rank nor station nor prerogative in the republic of the grave. At that fatal threshold the philosopher ceases to be wise and the song of the poet is silent. There Dives relinquishes his riches and Lazarus his rags. The poor man is as rich as the richest and the rich man is as poor as the poorest. There the politician forsakes his honors, the proud man his dignity, the invalid needs no physician, and the weary are at rest.

And yet in this land of the free and the home of the brave it remains for this committee to bring before us a bill that would preserve the distinction of rank and station beyond the borders of the grave. And this is being offered as a war measure in a war that the President of the United States says is being waged to make the world safe for democracy. The idea of such a proposition in the bill is incomprehensible to me.

Let us see how absurd this article 3 really is. Set your imagination to work and imagine standing here before us the widow and two children of a private soldier. Standing also here by their side are the widow and two children of a captain. Standing over here still farther are the widow and two children of a colonel. And at the end of the line are the widow and two children of a brigadier general. The husbands of these widows and the fathers of these children have fallen upon the far-flung battle fields of Europe. And after their death here comes along old Uncle Sam with his kindly old face, arrayed in the Stars and Stripes, which stand for liberty, equality, and justice, and he stops before the widow and two children of the private and says: "Under this law, Madam, I am permitted to give you a check for yourself and these two children in the sum of $50. It may be, and probably is, true that you are just as refined and educated and just as worthy in every way as the wife and two children of the brigadier general who stands at the far end of the line, but I must give you only the check for $50." And then he passes on that way, stopping before the wives and children of the captain and the colonel, giving to them their different checks, until he gets over here to the wife and children of the brigadier general, and he bows and says: "My dear Madam, it is true that you are refined and educated and worthy in every way, but I am bound to admit that you are not any more refined and educated and worthy than the widow and the two children of that private soldier that stands at the head of the line, but yet, under a law passed by the Congress of the United States, the chosen representatives of the people, I turn over to you a check for $200 per month." The proposition is absurd on its face and surely will not find acceptance here. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to answer this question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I had intended offering a substitute to modify in some slight particular the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, but I intend not to press it and to center my efforts in advocacy of the very commendable amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. [Applause.]

Never before in the history of the country have we made such distinction as is proposed in this committee report between the pension to be paid to the officer's widow and the pension to be paid to the widow of the enlisted man. The highest under existing law that the widow of any officer can receive is $30, and that is in the grade above a colonel. Many and many a time have you of older service here seen forceful fights on the floor against granting even to the widow of a brigadier general the allowance of $50 a month. And it ill becomes us now to recognize any such gradations as called for in this bill. Up to the present moment this bill has dealt exclusively with enlisted men. They are put entirely on one plane. The provisions for allotments and allowances just passed are limited to enlisted men. Those provisions have met with unanimous support. The objection raised here is to the unequal favor bestowed on officers and their widows in this pension provision and in the insurance section. The country will not approve granting to officers with their large pay the privilege of taking large insurance at the cost of hundreds of millions of dollars to the Government, and if the war lasts long of more than a billion, and this privilege being virtually denied the enlisted man because of his limited pay. The same vice of preference to the officer and his widow permeates the section under consideration. Who can go before the country and say, as has been eloquently said by the mover of this amendment, that there is any recognition or distinction between the widow of an enlisted man and the widow of an officer when the grave has closed the ranks of the enlisted man and the officer? They are the same in feeling, the same as to needs, the same in the generality of estimation. And particularly now, when we are drafting men to serve in the draft army, there should be no distinction as to rank or grade. Men of the same caliber, of the same ability, are found in the private ranks as are found in the grade of officers.

True, there may be some who happen to have a college education that has given them preferment so far as being designated for officers' training camps is concerned. But as far as the mettle of the men is concerned they are more on a par to-day under the existing system of draft than they have ever been before.

We should not at this time, when everyone is akin and all in unity in trying to bring this war to a successful end, recognize a distinction that will cause ill feeling, that will make the enlisted men feel that their widows are not receiving the same consideration as the widows of officers. And so I ask with all the emphasis in me that you do not for the first time, I may say, in the history of the Government recognize this distinction of segregation whereby you elevate the widow of an officer above the widow of an enlisted man. [Applause.]

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman oppose the amendment?

Mr. SWITZER. I thought we could offer amendments now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not offer an amendment, but if there is some one opposed to the amendment—

Mr. SWITZER. I favor it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Missouri opposed to the amendment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is very persuasive and has great merit, and it depends on your viewpoint as to how you may regard the merits of the provisions written in the bill and which he seeks to amend. This bill is framed on the theory of compensation for services and is based on the pay received by the commissioned officers and enlisted men.

Now, I do not know how many share the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] that the major general in the Army ought to receive the same pay as the private. Men are taken from civil life into the service of the Government in the Army. This bill is framed with a view of compensating them for service. That compensation to them and their families is based upon the pay they receive in the service.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, right there—

Mr. ALEXANDER. I must decline to yield to the gentleman at this time. Now, all our compensation laws are based upon a man's pay in the service and the compensation to his family is based upon the wage he received in his employment at the time of his injury. It may be that the officers' widows in the event of the death of the officers will get too much if they get $200. We could cut that to $100 or any other sum the committee reported as just. I would not make any such wide distinction between them. But time and again has the Congress of the United States passed special pension laws giving to widows of officers in the Army and Navy pensions far in excess of the pensions granted to the widows of privates. But this is not a pension bill. This bill is not framed on the theory of a bonus granted by the General Government to one who renders service to the Government, but, I say, it is on the theory of compensation. It may be equitable or it may not be equitable, but the pay or the compensation is framed in proportion to the service. I am undertaking to explain the theory on which the provision in the bill is framed.

Now, I doubt if the cost of the provision made in this bill will be very much different from the cost in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], except as to officers, and I say that if you think that $200 per month to the widow of an officer is too much that can be reduced. But I do insist that when you come to analyzing the provisions in the bill you will find that it is not a bonus; it is not a pension in the ordinary sense of that term; it is called compensation. It is immaterial whether you call it a pension or compensation. A man is earning more money.

Now, if we are going to give it simply as a bonus, simply as a recognition of service, then, of course, this legislation might be framed along the line of the old pension laws. But, as I have said, it is framed on a different theory, and there is very little difference in the compensation to the one class and the other among the privates under the provisions of this bill.

In the Regular Army there are men who have served for many years. They receive longevity pay, and they may possibly receive more than a private who has just gone into the service or one who may not serve any longer period than during the war. There will be a difference between them, but it will be based upon their pay. The men in the Regular Army have withdrawn from all civil pursuits. They have given over all opportunity to earn money, to make provision for their families beyond the pay given them by the Government. Now, under this bill if they are killed or permanently disabled provision is made by the Government for their families upon the basis of pay they receive in the service.

It remains for the committee to take the view presented by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas, if they regard that the more equitable view.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The Chair desires to inquire if there are any other gentlemen who desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. If so, the Chair is ready to give recognition.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is the debate exhausted on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is fixed at 70 minutes on the section. Under the rule the debate would be exhausted on the amendment. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLACK offers the following amendment to section 301 of article 3: In lines 17 and 18, page 17, after the word "alone," on line 17, strike out the words "25 per cent, but not less than $30," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$35," so that subdivision (a) as amended will read: "(a) For a widow alone, $35."

Also, in lines 19 and 20, after the word "child," in line 19, on page 17, strike out the words "35 per cent, but not less than $40," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$45," so that subdivision (b) as amended will read: "(b) For a widow and one child, $45."

Also, in lines 21, 22, and 23, after the word "children," in line 21, on page 17, strike out the words "40 per cent, but not less than $50, 5 per cent additional, but not less than," and in lieu thereof insert "$52.50," so that subdivision (c) as amended will read: "(c) For a widow and two children, $52.50, with $5 for each additional child up to two."

Also, in lines 24 and 25, after the word "child," in line 24, on page 17, strike out the words "20 per cent, but not less than $15," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$20," so that subdivision (d) as amended will read: "(d) If there be no widow, then for one child, $20."

Also, in lines 1 and 2, page 18, after the word "children," in line 1, on page 18, strike out the words "30 per cent, but not less than $25," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$35," so that subdivision (e) as amended will read: "(e) For two children, $35."

Also, in lines 3 and 4, page 18, after the word "children," in line 3, on page 18, strike out the words "40 per cent, but not less than $35, 5 per cent additional, but not less than," and insert in lieu of the language stricken out the figures "$45," so that subdivision (f) as amended will read: "(f) For three children, $45, with $10 for each additional child up to two."

Also, in lines 6 and 7, on page 18, after the word "mother," in line 6, strike out the words "20 per cent, but not less than $25," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$30"; and in lines 10 and 11, on page 18, after the word "exceed," in line 10, strike out the words "50 per cent of the pay, or $60, whichever is the greater," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$75," so that subdivision (g) as amended will read: "(g) For a widowed mother, $30. The amount payable under this subdivision shall not be greater than a sum which when added to the total amount payable to the widow and children does not exceed $75. This compensation shall be payable for the death of but one child, and no compensation for the death of a child shall be payable if such widowed mother is in receipt of compensation under the provisions of this article for the death of her husband."

Also, strike out all of lines 16 and 17 on page 18.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. McKENZIE. On page 17, in subdivision (a), I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] by making the words in figures "$30" instead of "$35."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Amendment offered by Mr. McKENZIE as a substitute for the Black amendment: On page 17, line 18, strike out "$35" and insert "$30."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, it certainly would be a very nice thing if it were possible in this country to have an army of soldiers without dependents. But that is impossible. We all know that prior to April 5 of this year, when we passed the resolution declaring that a state of war existed between our country and the German Empire, we had several hundred thousand men in the Military Establishment of this country, and that after we passed that resolution and the men of this country heard the clarion call to war several hundred thousand more of them volunteered, not stopping to think, perhaps, about the duties they owed to their families and dependents, but simply answering to the call of country. That gave us several hundred thousand more men in this country in the military service, many of whom had dependents.

But we, realizing the great struggle we were in, felt that we must provide for a still greater army, and therefore we passed what is known as the conscription law, a law based upon the idea that all men in this country are subject to military service in time of war. In passing that legislation we not only recognized the fact that this is a democracy, but we further recognized that in war we should endeavor to take out of it all of the sorrow and the suffering that is possible on the part of the dependents of the soldier, and accordingly we provided that men with dependents should, so far as possible, be excused. However in the administration of that law many men have been taken into the service who have dependents.

More than that, in the Regular Army of our country we have provided by law that the officers shall have higher salaries than the privates, and justly so, because of the greater responsibility and the greater amount of work that they perform. But we followed along the line of democracy when we summoned the great army, when we said, "We have got to educate thousands of officers," and we provided that a poor man's son could go into the training camp and receive $100 a month while he was being trained as an officer in this great army. We recognized democracy in all of these things, and especially in the conscription law, which provides that the rich and the poor shall serve on an equality.

Now, what does this bill propose to do? This bill as it is written strikes a blow at the very foundation of democracy in this country, and it is the first attempt that I know of to create in this country classes, caste, preferred persons, preferred dependents. It is true that these officers should get more pay when in the service, but when this war is over the thousands of them that we are now making officers of and giving commissions to will go back home and become private citizens again, after having performed a patriotic and loyal duty to their country. [Applause.] But, after all, the women and children interested in this great bill are all citizens of our country.

Under the Constitution of this great free land the wife and the children of an officer have no more rights than the wife and the children of the private. [Applause.]

More than that, I want to say to you, gentlemen of the House, that this provision in this proposed law is in contravention of the very principles for which these boys are going forth to fight. [Applause.] I want to tell you something: If you want to destroy the morale of this great American Army that we are building, if you want to bring dissatisfaction into millions of homes in this country, stand by the committee report. But if you want to be true Americans, if you want to stand for that equality upon which our country was founded, and whose example has been a beacon light to all the other nations of the world, and is even at this time shaking the foundations of the German Empire, vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas and all similar amendments. [Applause.] Let us serve notice on all the world that this is a democracy, where we treat our citizens alike. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute, to amend section (b) to read $40 instead of $45.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order at this time. There are two amendments pending, and that is all that can be pending at one time unless the amendment offered be by way of a substitute for the whole. The gentleman will be recognized later to offer that. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not yet in order. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this vote on the series of amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement it was provided that this amendment should be offered, considered, and voted upon as one amendment. The question is upon the series of amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 139, noes 3.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWITZER to section 302 of article 3—

The CHAIRMAN. Section 302 has not yet been reached.

Mr. SWITZER. I withdraw the amendment. I thought it had been reached.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. Under section 301 it is provided that if the soldier leaves a widowed mother substantially dependent upon him for support, then this compensation shall be paid. What I want to ask the gentleman is, Is it the intention of the committee that at the time the soldier dies he must have a widowed mother? Suppose, for instance, he has a father and mother living at the time he dies. Subsequently the father dies. Is there any opportunity for that widowed mother to apply for compensation under this law?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have an amendment here that has been suggested, and I rather think it ought to be adopted. This language has been suggested to come in line 15, page 18, and I think it will cure the objection of the gentleman from Missouri:

Add after the word "husband," in line 15, page 18, the words "such compensation shall be paid whether her widowhood arises before or after the death of the person, and whenever her condition is such that if the person were living the widowed mother would have been substantially dependent upon him."

Mr. IGOE. I hope the gentleman will offer that amendment, because it meets the condition I have been speaking of. For instance, in section 311 of this bill the application must be filed within a year, and it occurred to me that under the language of section 301, unless that condition of widowhood existed at the time the soldier died, the mother afterwards, in case she became a widow by the death of her husband after the soldier died, was going to be cut off. May I ask the gentleman if he proposes to offer that amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. I offer the amendment, Mr. Chairman, if I may do it in the gentleman's time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield the floor?

Mr. IGOE. For the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Texas to offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman yields the floor, he yields it for all purposes.

Mr. IGOE. Then I yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAYBURN: Page 18, line 15, after the word "husband," add the following:

"Such compensation shall be payable whether her widowhood arises before or after the death of the person, and whenever her condition is such that if the person were living the widowed mother would have been substantially dependent upon him for support."

Mr. RUCKER. A parliamentary inquiry. This whole paragraph to which this is offered as an amendment having been amended by the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, the word "husband" will doubtless not come in line 15 any more. As I understand the gentleman, this is intended to be offered after the last word of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be changed to read so that it will come in after the last word in the paragraph. I rather think the wording of the amendment is all right, though.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to both gentlemen in answer to the parliamentary inquiry, that this is a clerical proposition. The amendment is offered in the correct form, and when it comes to the enrollment of the bill, under the rules and practice it will be properly enrolled.

Mr. RUCKER. I merely wanted to clear up any question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 302. That if disability results from the injury—

(1) If and while the disability is total so as to make it impracticable for the injured person to pursue any gainful occupation, the monthly compensation shall be the following percentages of his pay:

(a) If he has neither wife nor child living, 40 per cent, but not less than $40.

(b) If he has a wife but no child living, 50 per cent, but not less than $55.

(c) If he has a wife and one child living, 55 per cent, but not less than $65.

(d) If he has a wife and two or more children living, 60 per cent, but not less than $75.

(e) If he has no wife but one child living, 50 per cent, but not less than $50, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $10, for each additional child up to two.

(f) If he has a widowed mother substantially dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above, 10 per cent, but not less than $10.

To an injured person who is totally disabled and in addition so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $20 per month, as the director may deem reasonable.

The maximum monthly compensation for total disability shall be $200.

(2) If and while the disability is partial, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total disability, equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.

A schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combinations of injuries of a permanent nature shall be adopted and applied by the bureau. Ratings may be as high as 100 per cent. The ratings shall be based, as far as practicable, upon the average impairments of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations and not upon the impairment in earning capacity in each individual case, so that there shall be no reduction in the rate of compensation for individual success in overcoming the handicap of a permanent injury. The bureau shall from time to time readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with actual experience.

(3) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances, as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary.

(4) The amount of each monthly payment shall be determined according to the family conditions then existing.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLACK offers the following amendment to section 302 of article 3: Strike out the words "percentages of his pay," in line 20, on page 19, and insert in lieu thereof the word "amounts."

Also, in lines 21 and 22, on page 19, after the word "living," in line 21, strike out the words "40 per cent but not less than $40" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$40," so that subdivision (a) as amended will read as follows: "(a) If he has neither wife nor child living, $50."

Also, in lines 23 and 24, on page 19, after the word "living," in line 23, strike out the words "50 per cent but not less than $55" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$50" so that subdivision (b) as amended will read as follows: "(b) If he has a wife but no child living, $65."

Also, in lines 25 and 26, on page 19, after the word "living," in line 25, strike out the words "55 per cent but not less than $65" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$75," so that subdivision (c) as amended will read as follows: "(c) If he has a wife and one child living, $75."

Also on page 20, strike out all of line 2 and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$85," so that subdivision (d) as amended will read as follows: "(d) If he has a wife and two or more children living, $85."

Also, in lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 20, after the word "living," in line 3, strike out the following words: "50 per cent but not less than $50, 5 per cent additional, but not less than," and insert in lieu of the words stricken out the figures "$60," so that subdivision (e) as amended will read as follows: "(e) If he has no wife but one child living, $60, with $10 for each additional child up to two."

Also strike out lines 13 and 14, on page 20.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify that amendment so that in subdivision (a) the figures "50" will be stricken out and the figures "40" substituted, and in section (b) the figures "65" be stricken out and the figures "55" be substituted, and in subdivision (c) that the figures "75" be stricken out and the figures "65" inserted, and in subdivision (d) that the figures "85" be stricken out and the figures "75" inserted, and in the other places in the amendment to strike out the figures and restore the minimum amount in the section as now in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to modify my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify it.

Mr. BLACK. Then, Mr. Chairman, I do modify it to the extent of the changes which I have just made. I am not going to make any speech on this amendment, because it carries out the same theory as the amendment already adopted to section 301 of article 3, and I have already spoken on that amendment, and will not repeat the arguments which I used in its behalf.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment as modified be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section (a), strike out "$50" and insert "$40."

Section (b), strike out "$65" and insert "$55."

Section (c), strike out "$75" and insert "$65."

Section (d), strike out "$85" and insert "$75."

Section (e), strike out "$60" and insert "$50."

Section (f), strike out "$15" and insert "$10."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that paragraphs (e) and (f) may be read in full as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report paragraphs (e) and (f).

The Clerk read as follows:

Also, in lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 20, after the word "living," in line 3, strike out the following words: "50 per cent, but not less than $50, 5 per cent additional but not less than," and insert in lieu of the words stricken out the figures "$50," so that subdivision (e) as amended will read as follows:

"(e) If he has no wife but one child living, $50, with $10 for each additional child up to two."

Also, in lines 7 and 8, on page 20, after the word "above," in line 7, strike out the words "10 per cent but not less than $10" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$10," so that subdivision (f) as amended will read as follows:

"(f) If he has a widowed mother substantially dependent on him for support, then in addition to the above $10."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what modification of subdivision 1 under section 302 is made?

Mr. BLACK. I strike out the words "percentages of his pay," in line 20, and substitute the word "allowances."

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. I will suggest to the gentleman that his amendment be further modified by striking out the words "the above," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "what he would otherwise receive." It is not clear to me what "the above" refers to.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think there is any ambiguity about that; I think it ought to remain as it is.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. REED. Would the gentleman consider it advisable to change the phraseology of line 17, which reads "if and while the disability is total," and so forth?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think that needs any modification. I will say without any further argument that the amendment I have offered cuts out percentages paid to the men, so that there will be no distinctions and discriminations in the benefits paid to the officers and privates for the same class of injuries.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand, then, that for total blindness the pensioner would receive $40 a month if he has no children, and so on.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; with $20 for nurse hire, if that is necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And for the loss of both legs or the loss of both arms, and so on.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; and $20 for a nurse if he needs it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to say that I am in hearty sympathy with the striking out of these percentages and making the allowance equal. I do think the rates now allowed for disability incurred in the service of $100 a month for total blindness or the loss of both arms or the loss of both legs should be substituted for the figures in the bill, in view of the changes that have been made. I submit that if that is not done, if the bill by any sort of chance should never become a law, the gentleman will undoubtedly introduce a bill to give that soldier who applies to him $100 for total blindness when by his side another soldier is drawing the same amount for the same kind of disability.

I want to ask the gentleman a further question. What age the child must be before it ceases to be a dependent child?

Mr. BLACK. Eighteen years. That is fixed in the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; but is it so fixed in the bill as to make it understood to apply to this section?

Mr. BLACK. I think there is no sort of question about that. The bill is well drawn in that respect.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment by Mr. HUSTED: Page 20, line 7, strike out the words "the above" and insert in lieu thereof the words "what he would otherwise receive."

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the words "the above" are scientific or customarily used in statutes in the sense in which they are used here. Of course it means that he is to receive the amount provided in subdivision (f) in addition to what he would otherwise receive under any one of the foregoing subdivisions, but the words "the above" do not refer to any particular subdivision and are confusing, I think.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, can I offer a substitute at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer a substitute to the amendment or an amendment to the amendment or a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. SWITZER. I offer the following substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That for the loss of both feet or both hands or both eyes, or for becoming totally blind from causes occurring in the service of the United States, the rate of compensation shall be $100 per month.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

The question was taken, and the amendment of Mr. HUSTED to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN was recognized.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, was the amendment voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to put the question when the gentleman from Texas rose and was recognized. The amendment has not been voted upon.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I did not resist the amendment offered by my colleague from Texas a while ago, but I fear that that vote will rise to plague Congress hereafter. Of course, that was for death of the soldier or compensation to the widow and children. I think that perhaps it is useless to oppose the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Texas to this section of the bill. However, if it is adopted, I think it will be very unfortunate. If the amendment applied only to the drafted army and officers in that army who are taken in at this time, it would be a different thing altogether. This part of the bill is based upon the idea of compensation. When you adopt this amendment you are absolutely destroying that principle in the bill. Now, in this instance, a man is totally disabled. Probably he has been getting a salary of a captain or a colonel or brigadier general for many years past. His family has been getting the benefits of the use of that. In this you destroy all of that when you put him upon the flat basis of the private soldier in the ranks.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Would not a general under these circumstances receive his retired pay? That is if he accepts the pension, but of course he would not accept the pension in place of retirement pay.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know this amendment is going to be adopted and I just want to say I believe it is unjust. I believe it throws the bill out of joint and I think the members of this committee who, with so much enthusiasm, voted for it are going to live to regret that they have done it. We have been generous with the private soldier and we have with everybody else I think, and I do not think we are justified in cutting off the family of some man under this bill as they will be cut off under compensation that would have been provided if the original section had been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 802 of article 3 by inserting on page 20, at the end of paragraph 1, the following:

"Provided, however, That for the loss of both feet or both hands or both eyes, or if becoming totally blind by causes occurring in the service of the United States the rate of compensation shall be $100 per month."

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I may appear to you to be over anxious and zealous about this matter, but when I first read over this new pension bill that had been introduced in this Congress, it struck me that there was certainly going to be a grave injustice done to this class of helpless men. Do you know—I am fearful that a great many members of this committee do not know what is on the statute books now. Do you know that in 1890, 36 or 37 years ago, the Congress of this country passed a law that gave a man who lost his hands $100 a month?

That withstood the financial depression of all these years—of 1896 and of 1907. Nobody has had the audacity to propose to reduce the pension for that sort of helpless soldier until here comes this bill that renders nugatory the pension laws now upon the statute books, and thereby renders the pension of a man who has lost his legs, who has lost his hands, who has lost his eyes, and gives him but $40 a month and $20 if he needs an attendant. Whether or not that liberal-hearted individual who will be appointed to write out the rates of partial disability will say this man is only partially disabled, and only give him a per cent of $40 in the latter part of this section, I do not know, but I want to forestall that. I do not want this injustice done. There are some 300 of these now upon the pension rolls of your country. If any soldier has lost his legs, has lost his hands, or has lost his eyes since this war commenced, there is a right accrued entitling him to $100 a month, and if this bill becomes the law without carrying this amendment you reduce it to $40 a month.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I yield.

Mr. RUCKER. In view of the fact this bill provides an additional $20 for hospital treatment or nurse, does not the gentleman—

Mr. SWITZER. Well, make it $60.

Mr. RUCKER. If that provision stays in the bill, does not the gentleman think the provision ought to read $80 instead of $100, so as to put him on an equality with other soldiers?

Mr. SWITZER. I will modify the amendment, if I may be allowed, and say he shall receive not less than $100 a month. That is the way I had it originally.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman caught my idea. Existing law gives a soldier $100 a month, as the gentleman has suggested, but there is no provision for the $20 for nurse, as this law carries it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

Mr. SWITZER. I will ask to modify the amendment so that the $20 nurse fee—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to draft it.

Mr. SWITZER. Provide it this way: $100 a month and no more. Anybody can understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That for the loss of both feet or both hands or both eyes or if becoming totally blind by causes occurring in the service of the United States the rate of compensation shall be $100 per month and no more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do you intend by your modification to eliminate the provision later in the bill providing for $25 a month as an insurance for those who are disabled?

Mr. SWITZER. It has nothing to do with the insurance feature. It is a pension article of this bill that we are working on at this time. So far as that insurance is concerned, it is nothing but a jack pot. It is so arranged—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be recognized in favor of the amendment?

Mr. RUCKER. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by striking out "$100" and inserting "$80," and by striking out the words "and no more."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUCKER to the Switzer amendment: Strike out "$100" and insert in lieu thereof "$80," and after the word "month" strike out the words "and no more."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment.

Under existing law a soldier who is totally disabled in line of duty by the loss of both eyes or both arms or both legs is pensioned at the rate of $100 a month. This bill as reported by the committee would give him $40 a month and $20 extra for a nurse if he needs constant attention, which, in the total, would be $60. And if the amendment as amended by the suggestion I have offered should be adopted it would then provide for the soldiers $80 of so-called compensation plus $20 for hospital services or for a nurse, which would put him on equality with soldiers under existing law.

Mr. SWITZER. Just one question. How do you know what the man who is to be in charge of administering this proposed law is going to figure on partial disability?

Mr. RUCKER. The language of this amendment is that if the soldier loses both eyes or both feet or both arms he shall receive the sum mentioned.

Mr. SWITZER. Suppose the man that is administering this law says that this man is only partially disabled, and he gets only a per cent of $40 a month; then he does not get the $20 nurse fee?

Mr. RUCKER. The amendment as offered by the gentleman provides that if a soldier in the line of duty loses both eyes, both arms, or both legs he shall be pensioned or compensated at the rate of $100 a month. The amendment I offer places the sum at $80 per month.

Mr. SWITZER. You say that he will get $20 more. But how do you know he will get that?

Mr. RUCKER. He will if he is totally disabled, and if he is not totally disabled he ought not to have it. But a man who has both legs off or both arms off or both eyes out is totally disabled.

Mr. SWITZER. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to preserve the original pension as it is in the law to-day and as it has been for 40 years?

Mr. RUCKER. That is what I want. He would get $100 a month under the present law, but your amendment provides for $100 per month in addition to the $20 per month which the bill allows for a nurse, which would give a soldier suffering the disability mentioned $120 per month, or $20 more than the pension allowed under existing law for such injuries. I want to make the law equitable and just to all soldiers suffering similar disability.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

To have one's eyes shot out or to be stricken through any other cause with total blindness is to suffer an unspeakable affliction. If any gentleman wishes to feel a little of how terrible it is, let him close his eyes now, shut out the light of this beautiful day, and think, if he can, of what that darkness would mean if he knew that it must follow until the grave shall close over him. And yet this section of the pending bill proposes that the United States of America, the richest of nations, raising money for war purposes by billions, shall pay to those of its defenders who in the line of duty are stricken blind the sum of only $40 a month and $20 for an attendant.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Do you think if he is married he should receive a larger compensation than if he is single?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Any man in the military service of this country who in the line of duty is stricken with total blindness, whether he has or has not a family, ought to receive not less than $100 a month from the Government.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This amendment applies to hands and feet as well as eyes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I believe that a man who loses both legs or both arms while defending his country should receive not less than $100 a month.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the present existing pension laws if a man loses the total use of his hands he gets $33.25 a month, and the same if he loses the total use of his feet.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But if both of his feet or his hands are shot off or amputated he gets $100.

Mr. ALEXANDER. My thought is this, whether the single man or man without family obligations should receive as much as a married man. A man with a family under this bill gets $75 plus $20, with an attendant, which would be $95.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To me that suggestion does not at all affect the justice of the proposition for $100 a month. The man without a family endures suffering as awful and renders service as devoted and noble as does his companion who has a family. We ought to care for him because of what he undergoes in defense of the Nation. In supporting this amendment we are simply trying to do justice to every defender of the Republic, who in the line of duty is thus terribly afflicted. That is all.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. COX. Ought we not to pay that man enough to enable him to get married and have a family of his own, if he is a single man?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Perhaps so. I want only to do justice to the man who suffers in his country's defense.

Mr. Chairman, our boys in France have gone there with knowledge of the existing pension law, which provides that if they are stricken with total blindness while doing their duty they shall have $100 a month. But now, sir, after they have reached France and are close to the trenches and the field of death, should their eyes be shot out or their legs or arms be shot off, we are asked to reduce the amount to be paid them from $100 to $40 a month, with $20 for help. And that we ought not to do. It would not, in my judgment, be at all just. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. I now move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the words "and no more" at the end of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] and to insert the words "but shall receive no allowance for nurse or attendance." That puts them on all fours with the existing law, and I think it ought to be accepted as a part of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment so that it will read in the way the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$100" and insert in lieu thereof "$80," and after the word "month" strike out the words "and no more" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "but shall receive no allowance for nurse or attendance."

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to have the amendment read as it would read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That for the loss of both feet or both hands or both eyes, or becoming blind from causes occurring in the service of the United States, the rate of compensation shall be $100 a month, but shall receive no allowance for nurse or attendance.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

Mr. DYER. It says there "both arms and both feet." Does that mean that a man must have lost both eyes and both arms and both legs?

Mr. SWITZER. It is "or."

Mr. DYER. Not according to the way I understood it was read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification?

Mr. DYER. I object unless the word "or" is included instead of "and." I ask unanimous consent that the word "or" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us first get the parliamentary situation straightened out. Then we will make more progress. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment as it would read if the modification requested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] should be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That for the loss of both feet or both hands or both eyes, or becoming totally blind, from causes occurring in the service of the United States, the rate shall be $100 a month, but shall receive no allowance for nurse or attendance.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment as requested by the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I do not object, Mr. Chairman, but I suggest that the words "the injured person" should be inserted there in order to make it good grammar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if it is left so that it can go to the point where it can be presented to the committee for consideration, we can consider the matter.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. There has been no amendment offered to this amendment, as I understand. Has the gentleman the right to modify?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] offered an amendment, and to that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] offers an amendment—an amendment to the amendment—and now the gentleman from Missouri is asking unanimous consent to modify his amendment to the amendment. The question is, Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri as modified.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have Judge RUCKER's attention just a moment. It seems to me that it would be better language, since this is a proviso, to make a second proviso and make your limitation on the nurse in this way:

Provided further, That there shall be no allowance for nurse or attendance.

The language is not good the way we have it now.

Mr. RUCKER. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman request that it be modified in that respect?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the amendment be still further modified by inserting the words "Provided further,"

Mr. RUCKER. It should be "Provided further, That no allowance shall be made for nurse or attendance."

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, where is there a prior provision to which this is an amendment?

Mr. RUCKER. The amendment itself starts out with a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] as modified to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 15.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SIEGEL offers the following amendment: Page 20, line 11, after the word "sum," insert the words "of $20 per month shall be paid." Strike out the balance of lines 11 and 12.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by me would provide for the payment of $20, and would not leave it to the discretion of any particular person who might be the director. We all know that it is mighty hard these days to get any nurse at $20 a month. If the director is going to have power to allow only two or three dollars a month the whole provision might be useless.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 303. That every person applying for or in receipt of compensation for disability under the provisions of this article shall, as frequently and at such times and places as may be reasonably required, submit himself to examination by a medical officer of the United States or by a duly qualified physician designated or approved by the director. He may have a duly qualified physician, designated and paid by him, present to participate in such examination. For all examinations he shall, in the discretion of the director, be paid his reasonable traveling and other expenses and also loss of wages incurred in order to submit to such examination. If he refuses to submit himself for, or in any way obstructs, any examination, his right to claim compensation under this article shall be suspended until such refusal or obstruction ceases. No compensation shall be payable while such refusal or obstruction continues, and no compensation shall be payable for the intervening period.

Every person in receipt of compensation shall submit to any reasonable medical or surgical treatment furnished by the bureau whenever requested by the bureau; and the consequences of unreasonable refusal to submit to any such treatment shall not be deemed to result from the injury compensated for.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: "In line 8, page 22, after the word 'compensation,' insert the words 'for disability,' so that it will read: 'Every person who receives compensation for disability'" and so forth. It is a formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: Page 22, line 8, after the word "compensation," insert the words "for disability."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment. I do not know whether we have passed the paragraph or not. If so, I should like to return to it. It is in conformity with the other amendment that I offered. I will ask unanimous consent to return.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We object to returning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend paragraph 2 of section 302 of article 3—

Mr. ADAMSON. We object to returning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to section 302 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. I object.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This section now under consideration provides for an examination by physicians to be designated or approved by the director. I have not offered any amendment except this formal one, but I simply take this occasion to call the attention of the committee and the majority party in this House to what I think might be done to help this bill and to assist toward the efficiency and economy of its administration. It occurs to me that we might well take advantage of some of the machinery that is already in existence in this Government of ours for the purpose of carrying out some of the provisions of this act. I well know that perhaps no one of us on our side of the House can offer any amendment that will be adopted and made a part of this law, but I submit a few facts to the consideration of this committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to disclaim the imputation just made by the gentleman. There is no partisanship in this committee and has not been in the House. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have offered amendments which have been agreed to. The gentleman from Wisconsin has had several adopted and so have others. There is no partisanship at all here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman that so far there has been no partisanship exhibited, and I did not make the remark with any idea of that kind; but I am submitting these facts with the hope that from your side of the House there may come at some time during the consideration of this matter some suggestions that I think will render this more economical of administration.

I doubt whether many of us have stopped to consider what sort of an institution we are building here. In the present war-risk insurance bill, created by the act of 1914, I find on examination that at this time there are 48 officers and employees in that department of the Government. In our Pension Bureau at this time, handling 673,111 pensioners on the rolls of the Government, we have in the employ of the Government 958 clerks and employees for the purpose of handling that sort of business.

I take it that no one here will disagree with me when I say that neither the Government of the United States, nor any other Government for that matter, will ever conduct its business more efficiently than the great insurance companies of the United States conduct theirs, and I want to call your attention briefly to what it takes in the way of employees to run the business of some of our insurance companies. At this time there are about 1,561,942 men in our Naval and Military Establishments, including the first draft of the National Army. Before the year is over we will probably have 2,000,000. Suppose we have 2,000,000 enlisted men. If we assume that 50 per cent of that number will take insurance, we will have a million risks being carried by this War-Risk Bureau.

The New York Life Insurance Co. at this time has 1,000,000 policyholders, in round numbers. The figures which I am about to quote have been furnished me by the secretaries and presidents of these various companies. At the home office of the New York Life Insurance Co. there are 1,653 officers and employees. In the economical administration of that great life insurance company, to handle the business of a million policyholders, it requires 1,653 employees.

The Mutual Life Insurance Co., of New York, has approximately 600,000 policyholders. The officers of that company inform me that they have 2,000 employees in their home office and 11,000 solicitors and examiners.

The Prudential Life Insurance Co. has 10,500,000 policyholders, and it has 28,000 employees. Many of these are in the field force. But, taking the figures that I have given you, I have shown that to carry the business of a million policyholders it will require at least 2,000 clerks and employees if you do it as efficiently as the great life insurance companies of this country handle their business.

We have in this country medical examiners for the Pension Department of the Government to the number of 4,502. They are skilled, trained medical examiners. They are stationed at salient points all over the United States. Why not use these pension examiners for the transaction of some of the business that will necessarily have to be transacted in connection with this War-Risk Bureau?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I desire two minutes to finish my statement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have two minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am for this bill. I have voted with this administration on every great measure that it has proposed. I intend to continue to do it, because I believe it is my duty. I am for my country and not for any party in this matter; but I suggest to the committee that those upon whom rest the responsibility should try to use as much of the machinery of this Government that we already have as possible. We ought to use what we have instead of building a new bureau that will entail an expense to this Government of a new building and an immense department of the Government greater than any that is now in existence. We should try to use some of the machinery that we already have.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. We use the surgeons of the Army and the Navy, and the law provides for the transfer from one department to another of any clerk needed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; but if the chairman will permit, this section provides that physicians shall be appointed by the director of this bureau, and everybody knows that a new set of examiners will be appointed all over the country, and before we know what we are doing we will have established an institution in this country that will take five, six, or seven thousand employees to run. I think it might be worth the consideration of those who have charge of this bill to take means to obviate some of the expense. While we are spending billions, let us not neglect to economize millions. There is no insinuation of any partisanship in this proposition, I am making the suggestion in the interest of economy.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a plain common-sense proposition—that we should utilize whatever machinery we have. I think the bill is ample to utilize these agencies for that purpose. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I hope that is true. I have talked with officials and employees in the Pension Department, and I am told by them that the Pension Department, with its present equipment and organization, can, without any considerable addition to its present force, handle the business necessarily created by the enactment of this proposed law. Through its corps of trained physicians and examiners throughout the country it could do this work at one-half the expense of this new bureau this act creates. The Pension Department is organized and going. It is housed in one of the best buildings of the Government; it has all the necessary equipment. Why not use it? However, the committee insists upon adding several thousand employees to our pay roll. The present Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, with its 48 clerks and officers, if this bill passes in its present form, must be extended, a new building must be built to house it, and a new organization perfected. I am heartily in favor of the principle of making for our soldiers and sailors the provisions contained in this bill. I am simply asking that extra and unnecessary expense be avoided in its administration.

The tendency is to multiply boards and commissioners. This tendency should be curbed. Government, to be efficient, ought to be centralized under as few heads as possible. If it is possible for us to avoid the creation of new offices and the multiplication of new boards and commissions, we ought to do it. In Illinois we have just seen the culmination of such a process of multiplication of governing boards. New commissions were created by successive legislatures until we found our State government inefficient and administered by 120 different boards, departments, and commissions. So inefficient did our State government become that during the last campaign Hon. Frank O. Lowden, a former Member of this House, made a campaign for nomination and election on a platform of reconstruction of our State government, and upon his election, by an immense majority, is now fulfilling his promises by a consolidation of all our inefficient, costly, and cumbersome boards and departments into nine centralized departments of the State government. We should avoid the same error here. The stress of war legislation ought not to distract our attention from possible measures of efficiency and economy.

In verification of my statements relative to the clerical help required in the handling of the business of our great life insurance companies I here insert the following telegrams:

NEW YORK, September 11, 1917.

Hon. W. J. GRAHAM, M. C.,

Hon. W. J. GRAHAM,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The Prudential has nearly 15,000,000 policies in force, representing about ten and one-half million policyholders. The approximate number of employees in all branches of service is 28,000.

THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO.,

WILLARD I. HAMILTON, Secretary.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Missouri. I move to strike out the last word. Who is it under this law that appoints the director and commissioners in this new bureau that you are now creating? Does the President or the Secretary of the Treasury appoint the director and the two commissioners? It is not specified.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Secretary of the Treasury did appoint the director of this bureau under the law which provided for it.

Mr. SWITZER. The Commissioner of Pensions must give a $200,000 bond when charged with the disbursement of a much smaller amount of money than will the director under this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. He does not disburse any money under this bill. He certifies it to the department.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The family pensions are disbursed through the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. SWITZER. But the Secretary of the Treasury will make these appointments.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 304. That if the injured person be deemed competent and not likely to become a public charge, upon his application and evidence satisfactory to the director that it will be for his best interests and for the best interests of his dependents, if any, future compensation payments for disability may be commuted in whole or in part for a lump sum equal to the present value of such payments or the proportion thereof to be commuted, and such lump sum paid to the injured person in lieu of all further compensation or of the proportion so commuted of all future payments of compensation: Provided, however, That in case of partial disability rated at 30 per cent or more of total disability, or in case of total disability not more than 50 per cent of the compensation payments as for a man without a wife or child shall be so commutable. The basis for determining present values of future payments of compensation shall be prescribed from time to time by regulation.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I can not conceive of any condition that could arise to justify the commutation of the compensation granted to any man under this act. The only thing that can result from commutation will be the loss in nine cases out of ten of every dollar that is received as the result of the commutation.

I know the authors of the bill believed that it might be wise to allow commutation under given circumstances. It is said that a man might want to buy a farm and that it would be of great advantage if he could commute a part of the compensation payable in monthly installments if not commuted; that he might invest the money in a farm and be able to live more comfortably than he could otherwise. Or he might want to go into the grocery business or the candy business or some other retail business.

Now, it is a well-known fact that 95 per cent of all men engaged in business fail. That is a large percentage, and many of these men who have been trained in a particular line of business and are experts in it fail, and the fair assumption is that if you commute the monthly compensation due to these men, that 95 per cent of them will lose every dollar you pay them in commutation.

I think if you want to conserve the comfort and happiness of the men who have been injured in the service, you will compel them to accept the monthly payments that are due under the act instead of giving them a lump-sum commutation of monthly payments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not likely to be a fact that after these men come back injured they will be made victims of unscrupulous persons who seek to get their commutation money?

Mr. MADDEN. Whether that is the case or not, if we are going to enact a law for the purpose of ministering to the comfort of the men who have been injured at the front, we ought to supervise the payment of the money and not allow any commutation. I think it would be much better for all concerned if we provide that those who have been injured in the service are sure of a certain monthly stipend rather than to allow them to commute and lose the money they get as commutation.

Now, we are going to educate the men who have been injured as far as we are able to do it, to make a man who is a cripple as nearly whole as it is possible to make him so by education. If while we are educating him and after we have educated him he is sure of a monthly compensation, together with the amount that may be added by what he can earn, and after he has been partially rehabilitated, he is more certain of comfort in the declining years of his life than he would be if you paid him one-half of the amount due in a lump sum and allowed him to lose it.

Now, what is the purpose of this compensation? The purpose is as nearly as may be to minister to the comfort of the men and to their families, and if we are going to act as conservators we ought to act as conservators to the limit of our power and should not, under any circumstances, allow any person to take a lump sum in part of the compensation we provide for in this bill. I know very well that I am talking to deaf ears.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce pays no attention to any suggestion that anybody may make with respect to the comfort of these men. They want the lines in the bill and the words that they have reported and not any suggestion as to what may apply to the comfort of those who may be injured as the result of their service in the war.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, my friend is mistaken. We would consider life to be a failure if we did not hear the gentleman's wise suggestions on all these different propositions.

Mr. MADDEN. But you do not hear them.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, yes, we do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, is there a motion to strike out this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I move to strike out paragraph 304.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out section 304.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 304 by striking out, page 22, section 304, line 18, after the word "compensation," down to and including the word "compensation" in line 24.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 22, line 18, after the word "compensation," strike out the following language: "Payments for disability may be commuted in whole or in part for a lump sum equal to the present value of such payments or the proportion thereof to be commuted, and such lump sum paid to the injured person in lieu of all further compensation or of the proportion so commuted of all future payments or compensation."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 25, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 304.

Mr. ADAMSON. That has already been voted down.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed over for future consideration, with a view of offering an amendment to perfect the text to meet the views I have tried to express here.

Mr. ADAMSON. When we finish the bill the gentleman can make his request to recur if he has an amendment ready.

Mr. MADDEN. I will have one ready.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman does not have to agree now.

Mr. MADDEN. I think we should.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman should get his amendment ready and make the request, and, if it is a reasonable amendment, we will not object.

Mr. MADDEN. The trouble is when we pass it now it will be passed and there will be no opportunity to return to it, because probably a man may say we have already passed this section, and I hope the gentleman will allow the matter to be passed over with a view of having an amendment prepared that will meet the situation.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will prepare a proper amendment, he will have no trouble in getting his request granted at that time.

Mr. MADDEN. I submit to the Chair that what may be considered as a proper amendment will be passed up to the gentleman from Georgia—

Mr. ADAMSON. That is mighty good.

Mr. MADDEN. And he might not agree that any amendment would be proper. I think I am not asking an unreasonable thing. Unanimous consent has been granted on numerous occasions to pass over different sections of the bill in order to let the committee prepare an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is so amiable and speaks so beautifully I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this section may be passed over, with the right to recur to it to offer an amendment hereafter.

Mr. SIMS. Simply for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois—not to be open for general amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course I am going to offer the amendment, but it ought not to shut out all amendments by any other gentleman on the floor.

Mr. SIMS. I will object if everybody is to be at liberty to offer amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is right to preclude others.

Mr. SIMS. I am willing for the gentleman to offer his amendment along the line which he is asking, but not to leave it open for any other amendment that any Member may conjure up.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEEKER. That will bar out amendments offered by the committee, will it not?

The CHAIRMAN. Unless offered through the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I would like also to have an opportunity to offer an amendment. I do not know what amendment the gentleman from Illinois will offer, but what I have in mind is to place the matter on an annuity basis instead of a lump-sum basis.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think there will be a particle of trouble about it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 305. That in cases of dismemberment, of injuries to sight or hearing, and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability, the injured person shall follow such course or courses of rehabilitation, re-education, and vocational training as the United States may provide or procure to be provided. Should such course prevent the injured person from following substantially gainful occupation while taking same, a form of enlistment may be required which shall bring the injured person into the military or naval service. Such enlistment shall entitle the person to full pay as during the last month of his active service, and his family to family allowances and allotment as hereinabove provided, in lieu of all other compensation for the time being.

In case of his willful failure properly to follow such course or so to enlist, payment of compensation shall be suspended until such willful failure ceases and no compensation shall be payable for the intervening period.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Mr. FESS, and Mr. ALEXANDER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In line 12, page 23, after the word "following," I think the letter "a" should be inserted, so that it should read "following a substantially gainful occupation."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment indicated will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I should like to have the attention of all the members of the committee here as to what I believe is one of the most important features of this legislation, and were I writing the bill I would have placed it as a separate article on an equal or coordinate basis with the other three heads, all of which I think are very important. I might say that I am in entire sympathy with this sort of legislation, and I think that without doubt we can expect it to be when in operation one of the best pieces of constructive work that the special session has accomplished. While there have been heard many objections as to the manner of bringing it here, that does not go to the merits or demerits of the measure. I may say, also, I do not share the opinion of proponents of this measure as a substitute for the pension system.

I want to call the attention of the committee, however, to the fact that the law thus far, and also including the insurance feature yet to follow, is mostly remedial, looking simply to relief in the form of compensation, while this clause goes far beyond that. This clause is not a gratuity. It has not in it the element of compensation as interpreted in the third article. This clause is attempting a rational utilization of human capacity that may have been retarded by injury, or if totally lost, then a substitute of other capacities that up to this time were not used, through a course of training under the direction of the Government. This effort in legislation which will take the soldier who returns without eyes and restore not eyesight but the functioning power that will enable him to do without eyesight work that will be commendable and honorable and at the same time impossible to do if it were not for the training he will have to have, strongly appeals to us all as most wise and commendable. That is the purpose of this particular phase of rehabilitation or reeducation. I have gone somewhat extensively into what has been done in the European countries since the war on this subject.

I find that Great Britain in the onset, unaware of the awful fatalities of the war, made no provision, and nearly all the work of rehabilitation done in the early part of the war was done by private effort, or associations of altruistic men and women, and by no governmental activity. In more recent months there has been a great movement in Great Britain that has taken on an official or governmental activity. And what Great Britain has been able to do in the recent month is very suggestive of what we can do. Especial reference is due to what has been done by the Murray Commission.

To-day in France, in the splendid school of St. Maurice, near Paris, there are really miracles being performed in what has been and is being done in taking an armless man and by training causing the functional power of the muscles that otherwise would be atrophied or dead, to continue or preserve its psychomotor power under a system of orthopedic treatment; and then by the utilization of what they call the prosthetic appliances, namely the artificial limbs, we see men who were hopelessly crippled, who come home with the expectation of being doomed to a life of idleness, which to me is the most awful fatality that could overcome any unfortunate, have the way pointed out by the aid of government training, in which they become, some of them, more useful in new lines than in lines in which heretofore they had not been disciplined. This is especially true in cases of the unskilled. That is being done right along in the schools, such as St. Maurice, which was originally a hospital, but which now has a splendid training school connected with it that is doing more valuable vocational work than even as a hospital.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. I still have 15 minutes of the hour in general debate left to me, and I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I am grateful for this time, because I want to say some things from the floor of the House rather than to insert them in the RECORD.

In addition to St. Maurice, there is a school in Lyon that is doing work similar to the other I mentioned, so that now in France the work which at first was merely altruistic is now official, with the stamp of the Government upon the work. There is much work of this sort done in Italy, but very little of it is done in Russia. However, in Belgium great strides have been made in the work of rehabilitation. But the most advanced work up to date has been done and is being done in Canada, which I now want to speak of.

Mr. TOWNER. Before you leave France, will you not tell the committee in what manner these men are taken care of by the Government? That is, what part has the Government in the arrangement of committing them or sending them to those hospitals, and how are they paid by the Government?

Mr. FESS. In France, as I understand it, they are taken into the convalescent hospitals, still under military control, and are retained upon the pay they were receiving while in the service, and they get the additional training without any extra cost to them and are kept under military service for certain reasons even after they pass into the secondary hospital, or, more properly, the training school. The problem of reeducation demands such skill of application and such adherence to wise practice, as well as precept, that military authority is preserved for specific reasons too apparent to argue. Those reasons will apply to us and we ought to keep them in mind here. The first, as given, is that unless they are under military authority they might, on the one hand, be discharged as soon as the wounds healed with no training, and, on the other, be left to linger in the hospital unduly. It is stated that a long time in a hospital without special training for special purpose results in two very dangerous items, one is the atrophy of the faculty of the organs—that is, a loss of the power of functioning—and the other is that it requires a long system of training to take a muscle, for example, that has been stunned by amputation and is now only a stump and make it function—as an amputated arm, for example—as if it were in the fingers, so that when they attach an appliance of steel on the stub they can, by this sort of training, make it possible for these armless boys to run a typewriter or to run a machine-tool appliance. What has been done in the field of orthopedic and prosthetic arts, in both this country and Europe, especially France, is astonishing. In the latter field the United States has taken very high rank. European authorities declare that this country is a marvel in the production of artificial limbs. But the real science forbids custom-made limbs but demands the made-to-order articles.

Dr. Amar, the most advanced scholar in this line in the world, has given many graphic illustrations of what they have been able to do in his laboratory. He is a far-famed enthusiast upon this possibility of what the world calls hopeless cripple. He has widely spoken and written on the theme. Many articles have appeared in American journals, especially the Scientific American, like the copy of April 28, 1917, and also another copy of the Scientific American of November 25, 1916. In both of these his graphic illustrations point to wonderful successes. A very graphic description is contained in the American Journal for Cripples, all of which will be found in the Congressional Library. While Dr. Amar has demonstrated the wonders of this rehabilitation, the greatest field is the war cripples under the authority and direction of the Government.

Mr. TOWNER. So that the Government keeps on the list the enlisted soldiers?

Mr. FESS. It does.

Mr. TOWNER. And they are subject, therefore, to governmental control?

Mr. FESS. That is true. The Government must exercise this control to avoid temptations, which will undo the work, prevent vicious indulgences that might have been permitted, improper exercise or no exercise, and to insure the occupation of the mind as well as the body. The training must be supervised by medical experts. It must start soon, because crippled men rapidly degenerate by idleness. Brooding over misfortune soon develops disease. Self-confidence restored is the first step to recovery since one who thinks himself a helpless wreck will soon be one. Quite naturally the doctor is the one to provide the hopefulness so necessary. Overstrain must be avoided, and overfatigue defeats the purpose.

Mr. TOWNER. And the Government also pays whatever is required for their extra maintenance.

Mr. FESS. This does not reduce his Government allowance. He is kept during the period of training. The pay stops only on his discharge, and that is not until he is ready to take the position for which the Government trained him. This offers a big problem—one of wages—as will be perceived. It is no extra expense to the individual at all. I think that ought to be observed in this law that we are framing especially. I wanted to say that in England they have what is called the "in-patient" and the "out-patient"; that is, the hospital, primarily for in-patients, is for healing the wounds, and the hospital, secondarily for out-patients, is for removing the consequences.

All hospital work is primarily for healing the wound, and the patient then discharged. But to remove the consequences of the wound is vastly more important. Now, I take it that this legislation is not to heal the wounds. That will be done anyway. But this legislation is specifically designed to take care of the consequences of the wounds, so that when the individual comes back dismembered or sightless or nervously prostrated the disability may be compensated. But his organs may be useless; capacities are wasted by loss of organs of industry; they may be atrophied; and that will surely be the case if no care is taken of him under careful methods of discipline. Therefore the practice in all the European countries through the "in-patient" and the "out-patient" system would be that the one is to heal the wound and the other is to remove the consequences, so that the one is medical while the other is vocational. This at once suggests the character of authority needed, not only medical but technical as well.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. What the gentleman says applies, I have no doubt, to a very large class of patients. But does he not think that the language of this bill covers the case, where it provides that if a patient or a man can not follow a substantially gainful occupation while he is taking this course of reeducation he shall be reenlisted under the pay that he got during his last month of service? Would not that fully cover the case?

Mr. FESS. I rather think it does. I am so anxious to insure sufficient authority to meet a grave problem that I raised the question at this time.

Mr. BORLAND. In other words, there must be a large number of cases where men need not be taken into enlistments, but are following an ordinary occupation, and yet the Government can provide them with additional vocational facilities; for instance, to turn a one-armed or one-legged man into a semioffice position or laboring position. It is a mental education instead of a muscular education.

Mr. FESS. Yes. It would not do to say to the man who is wounded, "We are going to put you in a position where you can achieve a reasonable living, in some cases better than you had before; but at the same time we are going to take away from you the compensation that is your due and which is carried in other parts of the law." I do not think that should be done. It would discourage if not totally dishearten him, a danger to be shunned. The only fear I have here is that this is so vastly important that the general authority given here, without specifying what the character or power of the commission is, might lapse and nothing might be done. It must have appeared to you all that whenever you undertake anything of a vocational character or of a spiritual nature there is not such a response in legislation as there is when there is a material element in it. That is the feature that I am much concerned about. I have not any amendment to offer, although I have given it the most careful study, but more largely to the character of the work to be done than the law under which it is to be carried on.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me this is vastly more important to the injured man than this question of compensation—this question of rehabilitating a man and making him a useful citizen.

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes. Here is a matter that appeals to us all wonderfully. We ought to assure every son who has gone to the war such an existence when he comes back—if he does come back—that he will be just as honored in that existence as if he had never been dismembered. Even more, we ought to assure a career as honorable as his sacrifice was great. [Applause.]

If we in legislation can make it possible for a man who comes back, not whole, but with many of his facilities for making a living gone; if we can make it possible, through a system of training, for him to regain his usefulness as a citizen in his social and industrial position, we can assure him that he will not simply be cared for but will be put in a position to help himself, where he can be on his own feet and command his position in society and in the industrial world. We should not do anything short of that if that is in our power, and I think it is. When the Government enters this field, which prior to the war had invoked but fugitive efforts of a select number of choice spirits in the world, it will find if the war lasts long a work simply stupendous in possibilities.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I would like to have my friend's opinion as to whether he does not think, considering the great importance of this matter, that it could be better dealt with in a separate bill or measure rather than by incorporating it in this bill?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my colleague that I see no need of putting it in a separate bill, provided sufficient authority is granted to enable an achievement commensurate with the great needs as I see them. I do think, however, that it ought to have been made a portion of the bill equally important with any of these other features bearing headlines. It should not have been given such subordinate consideration as a mere section of an article which in itself is not comparable in importance to this subject. The unimportant classification in the present act as it is written makes me fear that it might be neglected. We must not await public opinion on such a matter as this where time is so imperative. That is what makes me wish that it should be set out prominently, to insure a wide-awake consciousness of this great problem of the war, as to how it is to be done. There should be no question when the soldier comes home crippled. I want to say that delay is dangerous in this, because it means wasted life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, did you include the five minutes' time that I asked that the gentleman should have, and which was granted by the House?

The CHAIRMAN. When the Chair was putting that, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Esch] gave him 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman lift his voice, so that all of us can hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it not likely that there will necessarily have to be legislation, following the enactment of this act, if the war continues very long, and if there are many cases that come under treatment as specified in this section we will have to make provision by appropriation for patients of this kind?

Mr. FESS. Certainly; we will have to spend money, especially if we take the experience in Canada. It will require an outlay. The work can not be done by proxy or without governmental assistance. It comprehends various abilities, such as medical judgment, technical vocational skill, economic interests, and individual characteristics.

Medical judgment in control of the convalescent, the orthopedic treatment, and the prosthetic application.

Technical skill in the knowledge of the industries and the demands and possibilities of training.

Economic interests as a real producer in a community as related both to the labor and the product as well as supply and demand.

Individual bent in that a man can do better that which he likes or for which he has a taste than what becomes a drudge—a psychologic situation.

All this calls not only for most modern methods of hospital treatment but the best possible teachers as well as institutions, either existent or to be built.

And in Canada they have undertaken to utilize the existing institutions rather than to build up separate institutions, in order to avoid expense; and even in that case the expense is very large. In Canada the hospital commission has established a string of hospitals from Nova Scotia to British Columbia, organized and located in different parts of the country, some in private houses and some in Dominion schools, because these soldiers, returning wounded, are sent to the communities from which they came. So every Province of Canada, if I mistake not, has this sort of a convalescent hospital, added to which is the vocational feature. And it is going to entail considerable expense if we want to make it effective. Canada has a hospital commission, the result of a conference of all the heads of the Provinces, called together by the premier of Canada, and that commission has articulated itself with various local associations, so that there is a central authority in Canada, as there is not in any other country at war. And one of the biggest features of the war with reference to Canada is to take these convalescents and not simply care for them to put them back into the army, but so to remove the consequences of their injuries that when they go to their homes, too disabled to reenter the army, they can become effective civilians in this or that kind of work; sometimes the thing that they were doing, which is the rule of the skilled workman, but at other times taking them clear out of the former work that they were doing and starting them in other avenues of industry; and it is said that some of them in their crippled condition are to-day capable of getting a better wage than they were getting before they went. This is especially true of the unskilled man, who after government training often becomes more or less a skilled artisan, drawing a good wage.

Mr. MEEKER and Mr. TOWNER rose.

Mr. FESS. Before I yield to further interruption let me state Dr. Amar's finding as the result of his experience of three years. He makes this general statement: That of the war cripples, 85 per cent are capable of rehabilitation and reeducation, divided in this way: Forty-five per cent of them come back in their full capacity to do what they were able to do before they went, although it may be in different avenues.

As to 20 per cent, the consequences are partially removed and they are put in pretty good shape. Fifteen per cent are classed as fragmentary. Thus 80 per cent are cared for in professional schools with success. He says there are about 20 per cent all told out of the 100 per cent that are hopeless, noneducable, who can never be taught to help themselves, and must be cared for in homes where they are not expected to do anything at all for themselves. They become inmates of relief institutions, except a small percentage in special workshops. But fully 80 per cent are educated in what he calls the professional institutions, created either by the Government through utilizing existing institutions or by the Government building new institutions.

Here are these crippled men, legless and armless and sightless and deaf, some of them with other parts of their bodies maimed, others with their nerves shattered, so that, standing by a table, if a sound should occur, they would jump, because they have no control over themselves after coming out of the trenches and away from the explosions. How to take these unfortunate victims of this awful war and restore them is a Government problem as well as a duty. If 80 per cent of them under proper discipline can be brought back to the place where they can escape the awful consequences of modern warfare and where they can be honorable producers, it will be wicked if this Nation does not take the step immediately without a moment's hesitation. What has been done in Europe and Canada is but a suggestion of what we can and must do. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I simply want to ask this one question: I am sure that every Member of this House and everyone in this Nation is in heartiest accord with what the gentleman has said. Is the gentleman satisfied that this section of the bill as it now stands is sufficient to provide for the work of which he is now speaking?

Mr. FESS. I frankly state that I am not. My fear is the problem is not properly sensed as indicated by the section of the bill.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent that this section may be passed over for the time being.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have been studying on this section every day since it came in here, on the suggestion of some of the Members. I have not been able to word an amendment, and if some one else will assist I will be glad to see it left open for amendment. But the question must be met by special legislation to follow. It is too important to pass it over lightly.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent that the section be passed over.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Some gentleman on the other side of the aisle offered the suggestion that this item was so important that it might be better to take it up in a separate bill. I do not believe that the Members of this House, realizing the importance of it, would delay a matter of that kind. I believe that legislation could be enacted speedily, and it seems to me that there are so many things to take into consideration that it would be much better to bring this up as special legislation.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman that it ought to have more attention. It must be thoroughly worked out in the light of possible needs and capability. I am not particular at all about it being in another bill. I think it would be all right in this bill, if the department to which we grant the power is fully alive to the situation bound to be developed if the war lasts.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Just one word. The talk of my colleague has been highly illuminating, and he undoubtedly has given it a great deal of thought.

Mr. FESS. I have. I would say to my friend it is one feature of legislation that has claimed much of my sympathy.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. And I would like to ask him, in the event that the Federal Government takes this matter up, which I am sure it will—

Mr. FESS. It must. It is unthinkable that it will neglect such impelling duty.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Does the gentleman think it would be advisable for the Federal Government to have sole control over these various hospitals, or does he think it would be well for the several States to take it up and have their own hospitals?

Mr. FESS. Well, that is a big question. Federal relations are and have always been with us. Central authority must be respected here.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. All of these questions come up.

Mr. FESS. This much is true, that while the convalescent is in the hospital he must be under military authority, but when he is out of the hospital he ought not to be. He ought to be in a vocational field. Now, the question is so elaborate, so comprehensive, that my only fear is that the Congress, and especially the department vested with authority herein specified, do not properly sense the far-reaching possibilities of this legislation.

If the ranks of the unemployed are to be augmented by the frightful waste of human effort, due to this war, it will produce not only an army of hopeless war victims but a dead weight upon the processes of industrial recovery. While industry is strained by the abnormal demand for labor by the war until it invites the crippled soldier, every man must see at the end of the war the need of retrenchment when our unfortunate war victim will not be wanted and he will be turned into the street perhaps to beg. To secure him against it, he must be trained. No employer can be faulted for superseding the impotent with the skilled. He does not run his business as a benevolent institution. The safety of the injured soldier must not depend upon the altruism of business. The solution is not to induce the employer to pay more, nor even to continue employment, but to train the disabled to earn more.

When we speak of trades or the choice of trades, it is apparent that the injured soldier should if possible be returned to the trade or one akin to the trade he left.

It is futile to attempt to train all for the highest trade. Every man has the right under the circumstances of war to have a training that will insure the best that is in him, the maximum of results.

Sentimentalism must not take the place of judgment. The few trades must not be overdone. In Canada the following trades have been entered successfully:

1. Light metal working.
2. Mechanical drawing.
3. Woodworking.
4. Clay modeling.
5. Automobile and internal-combustion engines.
6. Gardening.
7. Poultry raising.
8. Beekeeping.
9. Floriculture.

In the language of one of England's best thinkers I express my views:

Habits of idleness are not easily shaken off. If these men are allowed to sink into despondency and apathy they will soon degenerate into chronic unemployables. They have made great sacrifices, and we owe it to them as a debt of honor to save them from an intolerable future. To give them an interest in life, to make them feel they are not useless wrecks, in short, to help them to help themselves, is the only way to give them a chance of the happiness they deserve. But there is no time to waste. Delay means wasted lives.

Mr. Chairman, the sacrifice our boys will make gives them the right to expect that their Government, for whose ideals they not only offer their lives, but, what is worse, an emasculated frame to be carried the balance of their lives, will omit no act or effort to place them back in a position of usefulness and independence. That is why I want to see this put in operation as quickly as possible, because what you do for these poor fellows who come back must not be delayed; if it is, the inevitable consequences of atrophy sets in and your opportunity is gone. If we take steps here and now to not only repair the shock of war, but to rehabilitate body and mind from that shock, this Congress will not in the days to come ever do a greater work.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that this section may be passed by without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am confident if the House understands the purpose of this section the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his request and the section be passed. All that Dr. Fess has said is true. This subject of reeducating and rehabilitating the wounded soldiers who come back from France is of the greatest importance. The matter requires the most careful and exhaustive study, and that study is now being given to the subject. The Surgeon General of the Army and, I think, the Surgeon General of the Navy are both conducting investigations. The Red Cross has two men on the sea now. Studies have already been conducted in Canada and in France, and it is necessary to gather the results of that study and to formulate another bill, a comprehensive measure, and that is the intention of those who are interested in the subject. It is the intention of the administration to draft such a measure, but such a measure can not be formulated now.

Gentlemen connected with the Government who have given the most thought and study to this subject throw up their hands and say, "We can not formulate such a measure now. We must conduct further study and investigations," and these studies and investigations are being prosecuted as vigorously as it is possible to prosecute them.

This paragraph is merely intended to be a pledge from the Government of the United States to the men who are going into the Army that if injured the Government of the United States will see to it that they are rehabilitated and reeducated in so far as it is humanly possible to do that.

Furthermore, when they have been rehabilitated and reeducated the Government of the United States now pledges that however remunerative their future employment may be, the compensation from the Government will not be reduced. In other words, that the efforts of the Government will not be carried out for the purpose of effecting a saving for the Public Treasury but for the purpose of benefitting the injured men.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I know that the gentleman is not only in sympathy with this sort of legislation, but that he has given the subject sufficient study to speak on it intelligently. I want the gentleman's opinion as to whether the bill as written will give the Government, without further legislation, sufficient power to meet these requirements.

Mr. KEATING. Further legislation must be had, but this paragraph is a pledge that such legislation will be enacted. I have no doubt that emergency cases may be taken care of pending permanent legislation. But how the reeducation and rehabilitation shall be carried out it is impossible now to formulate, and that statement is made on the authority of the men who have given a most exhaustive study to the subject and who are deeply interested in the question.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, if I may say one word. I am glad to say that for a number of months there has been in existence in St. Louis an organization known as the White Cross, the work of which I reported to Congress about three months ago. It was organized for doing this specific work long before the Government thought of or was in the work. I asked that the section be passed over temporarily in order that the gentleman from Ohio, in conference with others, might have more time to see whether this section could be improved upon for immediate action. That is all; it is not for writing a new section, but if it is found it could not be improved upon, let it remain as it is.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to make the further suggestion in line with what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] has said. The very terms of this section contemplate the necessity for further legislation, and I think the section as drawn is perhaps all that we ought to attempt to do at this time.

I want to state further, in the first place, the language of this section is very general and it will allow the Government to take care of any case that may arise until the time when we can effect or procure the legislation that may be finally required.

Now, to go into details, with the lack of information that we have, as the gentleman from Colorado suggests, would be unwise. We could not do it to-day or to-morrow, and this bill will be passed to-day or to-morrow. As I view it, the language of this section will allow the Government to carry out our purpose and intent, at least for the present.

I want to call the attention of Members to this fact: The provision of the section recites that the United States may provide or procure to be provided this assistance. We already have in the United States the best orthopedic institutions known in the world. It would be possible for the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War to send any person who might be disabled in that regard to one of these orthopedic institutions for treatment. The next section provides a form of enlistment and contemplates further legislation. It will not be difficult to get such legislation as is contemplated, and until that is done the young man may be considered and will be considered as already in the service.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I know that the gentleman from Iowa and I desire to get the same result. What I want to know of the gentleman as a lawyer is whether as it is written in this bill, without any further legislation, when this soldier would be returned and before the Congress meets again there is authority for the United States to care for him?

Mr. TOWNER. I think so, unquestionably; I do not think there is any doubt about it. Power is conferred directly on the Government of the United States, and the Secretary of War could order any maimed soldier who lost a leg or both legs or arms to one of these orthopedic institutions for treatment or to one of our splendid hospitals for the blind for treatment.

I think unquestionably we could do that. We have not, of course, governmental institutions to take care of these, but it is not necessary under the general terms of the bill. The Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy would have that power, in my judgment, under the provisions of this bill as it stands at present. Now, before I leave that, however, I want to say this: I do not believe that this is sufficient legislation by any means. I think that a special bureau or a special commission, perhaps an independent commission, should be provided to put into execution the provisions of the bill.

Mr. FESS. I think so.

Mr. TOWNER. But you and I, I do not think are ready, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, to say how that should be stated now or to say how it should be operated. I could not sit down to-day or to-morrow with the information I have and draw a bill or a provision satisfactory to myself to take care of such persons, but my point is this: The general power is conferred on the Government that will take care of all those persons until we can provide better legislative machinery for the purpose of taking care of them, and that we can do and ought to do now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the importance of this measure must be apparent to everybody. This section, if enacted into law within the next few days or few weeks, would answer the purpose suggested by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Colorado, but suppose this section is weighted down by the other provisions of this bill and it does not become a law within the next three or four months. Then what are we going to do? The importance, therefore, is apparent of a separate bill, to be enacted into law as soon as possible and provision made for taking care of our wounded as they return.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Am I misinformed? I have not heard it stated authoritatively, but is it the expectation that this bill will pass the Senate this session?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not think it is.

Mr. MEEKER. That is my understanding.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request—

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his request, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. Nobody has the floor now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee one question; that is, whether they do not think, in line 18, on page 23—first, I would like to ask what do they mean by the word "hereinabove"? Does that mean to this particular paragraph, section, or to all the bill preceding?

Mr. RAYBURN. That applies to allowances and allotments and, of course, it will have to apply back.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It ought to be, then, "hereinbefore," because "above" means on the same page.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman can offer an amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "hereinabove" where it appears in line 18, page 23, and in lieu thereof insert the word "hereinbefore."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 28, strike out the word "hereinabove" and insert in lieu thereof the word "hereinbefore."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I call attention of the members of the committee and others interested to this amendment which I suggest. The language in the first sentence is that this reeducation and vocational training may be given as the United States may provide or procure to be provided. It is not expressly stated that authority is given to the United States to do this. Perhaps it will be wise—certainly it would do no harm—if we should strike out the period after the word "provided" and insert this sentence, "and authority is given to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make such provisions."

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that would be unfortunate, I will say to the gentleman. As I interpret this, we are simply laying a foundation here and giving this authority—to lay a basis, in other words, for future action upon this question and probable legislation.

Mr. TOWNER. Do not we want to make it so that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy could take care of these cases now?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say, of course, it will involve appropriations to carry out these provisions, and propositions are submitted to the Appropriations Committee as to the method in which this law may be carried out, and the cost and the agency, and all those matters, it seems to me, can be more wisely considered then than for us to undertake to enact now how it can be done. I would suggest, however, that as a foundation stone we could say that the United States may provide or authorize to be provided. That would be a foundation for such agencies as might be determined upon.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. FESS. My thought is that we could very easily pass a needed appropriation, if it is a needed appropriation, now, when we are discussing this bill and everybody knows its needs; but what about the Appropriations Committee at an off time of the year where everybody is asking for this, that, and the other? My thought is that they may not listen to it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no; I think we can not do it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that with the knowledge we have of this question, and with the further statement that it is being investigated in all its ramifications, that probably this goes as far as we ought to go at this time.

Mr. TOWNER. I will agree with the gentleman, as I have already stated on the floor. The only thought I had was that perhaps there might be given authority to the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy to take charge of cases that might arise before we perfected legislation such as we desire. However, I will not press the matter. I have not offered it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 307. That in this article the term "pay" means the monthly pay at the time of the injury, or in case of disability resulting from disease, at the time of the beginning of such disability, unless at such time he is not in the service of the United States, in which case it shall be taken to refer to the monthly pay at the time of his leaving such service.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD] present? He had an amendment that he wished to offer.

Mr. RAYBURN. That was voted on yesterday.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was ruled out of order yesterday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking if in view of the amendment already agreed to it is not necessary to amend this section or to strike it out. This goes upon the theory that the payments for disability are made in proportion to the pay received by the injured party at the time of the injury.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have a provision for that in the family allowance section. It might cause some confusion.

Mr. RAYBURN. Furthermore, a soldier might be partially disabled the first time examined, and from that same cause might become totally disabled. The gentleman would not want to cut him off from a reexamination?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I refer to the principle involved rather than to the manner of pay. The principle has been changed and payments are now to be made for injuries to individuals rather than upon the amount of pay they were receiving at the time the injury was incurred.

Mr. RAYBURN. We still call it compensation in the provisions of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Suppose that is done. This refers to the pay that was received at the time of the injury and proposes to make a rating upon that pay, as I understand it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I was looking at section 306.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We have not read section 307 yet.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; we have.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to move an amendment to section 307.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of section 307 has not been concluded.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understood it had been concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon. Section 307 has been concluded.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee or the gentleman in charge—

Mr. ADAMSON. There is still a provision in the bill to the effect that he shall give a part of his pay to his wife as an allotment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It would have to be amended, if it did not refer to his pay.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not see any harm it would do to leave it in.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I believe it would do harm to leave it in. I do not want to make a motion to strike it out. I think the gentleman in charge of the bill should do so.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask that we pass it over, and I will look into it and ask unanimous consent to return to it, if necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 308. That no compensation shall be payable for death or disability which does not occur prior to or within one year after discharge or resignation from the service, except that where, after a medical examination made pursuant to regulations, at the time of discharge or resignation from the service, or within such reasonable time thereafter, not exceeding one year, as may be allowed by regulations, a certificate has been obtained from the director to the effect that the injured person at the time of his discharge or resignation was suffering from injury likely to result in death or disability, compensation shall be payable for death or disability, whenever occurring, proximately resulting from such injury.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey offers the following amendment: Page 24, line 18, after the word "obtained," strike out the words "from the director."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. When a man is really badly hurt in the Army or Navy and goes out, a certificate is given him by a physician in the Army or Navy, and that ought to be enough, if it is a disease that is likely to result in death or disability, and he ought not to be forced to go to a director of a new bureau within a year and get another certificate, and then, if he fails to get an extension for another year, fall of his rights. So I move to strike out the words "from the director." If a certificate is given him, that is enough.

Mr. RAYBURN. This is simply another amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey that would split up the administration of the bill, and I think it ought not to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 34.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for tellers. All those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty gentlemen have risen—a sufficient number. Tellers are ordered. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] will please take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 311. That no compensation shall be payable unless a claim therefor be filed, in case of disability, within one year after discharge or resignation from the service, or, in case of death in the course of service, within one year after such death is officially recorded in the department under which he may be serving: Provided, however, That where compensation is payable for death or disability occurring after discharge or resignation from the service, claim must be made within one year after such death or the beginning of such disability.

The time herein provided may be extended by the director not to exceed one year for good cause shown. If at the time that any right accrues to any person under the provisions of this article such person is a minor, or is of unsound mind or physically unable to make a claim, the time herein provided shall not begin to run until such disability ceases or a guardian is appointed of the minor or insane person.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer, on page 26, an amendment to strike out the word "or" on line 2, and all of line 3, embracing the words "or a guardian is appointed of a minor or insane person."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOUSTON: On page 26, line 2, after the word "ceases," strike out the word "or," and on line 3 strike out the words "a guardian is appointed of the minor or insane person."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that this provides that the claim for compensation must be filed within one year after the discharge or after the death of the soldier, and it provides that the statute shall not run against a minor or insane person until such disability ceases or a guardian is appointed. I do not think the minor should be precluded on the ground of the laches or negligence of a third party. It is not good legislation to bar a right to claim the compensation because of the fault of another. A guardian might be indifferent or negligent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEY of Ohio: On pages 25 and 26 strike out all of section 311.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am of the opinion that it would be very unwise to allow the statute of limitation to run against these soldiers. In all the pension legislation in the history of this Government under the general law, where the soldier is pensionable for some disability, he is permitted to file his claim at any time.

Now, let us take a concrete example. For instance, some soldier loses his arm in the service. After the war is over he comes home and for certain reasons does not care to file an application. He may be an attorney and think by the practice of law he could make a fairly decent living in his profession. But misfortune and adversity might overtake him. He probably loses his health and feels that he needs the help of the Government, to which he is entitled. If he waited for two years, the doors would be shut, and he would be forever barred from making an application.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, I submit that if a soldier was wounded in line of service and has a hospital record in the War Department, what difference does it make whether he defers making application for 3 or 4 or even 10 years? It seems to me this is one of the most unjust sections in the bill. I think the whole section should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER and Mr. DOWELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Iowa a member of the committee?

Mr. DOWELL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will be recognized first.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, section 308 of the bill provides—

That no compensation shall be payable for death or disability which does not occur prior to or within one year after discharge or resignation from the service, except that where, after a medical examination made pursuant to regulations, at the time of discharge or resignation from the service, or within such reasonable time thereafter, not exceeding one year, as may be allowed by regulations, a certificate has been obtained from the director to the effect that the injured person at the time of his discharge or resignation was suffering from injury likely to result in death or disability, compensation shall be payable for death or disability, whenever occurring, proximately resulting from such injury.

Now, if we should remove the limitation entirely as to when the application might be made upon the ground of disability of service origin, we would open the door to all sorts of fraud.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the case instanced by the gentleman from Ohio, if a soldier's arm is off, if we were confined to that class of cases, there would be no trouble about that, because that disability is apparent. But there are many diseases that might be contracted in the intervening years of a nature that might not be apparent, and an attempt might be made to connect them with his service. Under the bill as drawn he may go, during his service or within two years thereafter, to the medical examiner and be examined, and his disability, whatever it is, may be ascertained at that time; and if later it develops that it is permanent, or later if he dies of that disability, he is entitled to compensation under this provision of the bill.

But if you leave it open, without any limitation whatever, it will invite fraud; and it is to prevent that that this provision is inserted. If one year is not enough, we might say three years. That certainly would be time enough after the service is ended within which to determine whether a man is suffering from any disability of service origin. If three years are not ample, we should fix some time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I was going to suggest that possibly one year is too short, because that might lead to hastening into the bureau a large number of applications within 12 months—more than the bureau could conveniently and properly examine and discharge.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We might make it three years.

Mr. BORLAND. I think three years would be fair.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it five years.

Mr. BORLAND. I should like to ask the gentleman one more question. The provision in this section says that the time herein provided may be extended by the director not exceeding one year for good cause shown. Does my colleague understand this to mean that in a specific case it can be extended one year, or that he can make a general extension of one year for the filing of claims? It does not seem to me that the director ought to have the right in specific cases to show favoritism.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman is correct. I think it would be done by a general regulation under the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me it ought to be.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to this limitation of one year for the filing of these claims. It occurs to me that this limitation will work a great hardship and in many cases do great injustice to the men in the service and in fact many claims can not be presented because of this limitation. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], in his argument, has suggested that an extension of time for filing these claims will open the door to many frauds against our Government. In reply I want to say, that in my opinion a much greater injustice will be done the men in the service by placing this limitation in the law than can ever be done against the Government by the presentation of unjust claims under this act, because the Government is provided with all kinds of facilities and equipment for the investigation of these claims, and no claim will be paid which does not come within the provisions of this act. So far as I am concerned, I believe that every man in the service who has an honest claim, whether it be presented within 1 year or within 10 years from the time of his discharge from the service, ought to have an opportunity to present his claim to this commission, and if he is really entitled to it he should have his claim allowed. Should we adopt this section, as presented by the committee, and should we bar all claims not filed within one year, we will prevent many honest claims from being properly adjusted and paid. I believe that anyone in the service who has become disabled while in the line of duty should have his claim allowed and paid whenever presented. And this Government ought not to say to him, While you have a just claim it can not be considered because it was not filed within the year provided by law. Many honest claims may not develop even within the year, and this Government should not be technical and cut out honest claims because not filed in time. I believe that whenever such disability is developed, whether within 1 year or 10 years, the claim should be presented and it should have proper investigation, and if found a just claim it should be allowed and paid. Every man in the service should have ample time and ample opportunity to present his claim to this department. This Government can not afford to bar just claims because not filed within the year.

These men have been called to the defense of their country. They are hazarding their health and their lives in a cause of patriotism. Do not be technical should they be compelled to present a claim for disability.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was going to ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close. This would not cut off the right to offer other amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to be cut off.

Mr. LITTLE. I should like to have a little time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman desire recognition in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MADDEN. I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to strike out the section.

Mr. RUSSELL. An amendment to perfect the section comes first.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I submit that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has an amendment to perfect the section he should be allowed to offer it before the vote on the motion to strike out.

Mr. MADDEN. It will not interfere—

The CHAIRMAN. It would have had priority if it had been offered before the motion to strike out was offered and debated, but the motion to strike out having been offered and debated, it seems to the Chair that it does not have priority.

Mr. MADDEN. The amendment I offer would not interfere with the other in any way, so I do not raise that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LITTLE. I should like to say a word on that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that at the end of five minutes debate on this section and amendments thereto close.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman make it 10 minutes?

Mr. SWITZER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman give me two minutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will have to make my request 10 minutes, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at the end of 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want one minute of that time to say that I admit everything the gentleman says about wanting to hold the door open to honest claims, but the object of all laws of limitation of time is to preserve the truth, by demanding that the evidence be produced before time has obliterated it and rendered it uncertain and impossible of ascertainment.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. MADDEN. On page 25, line 12, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "ten"; in line 13, add the letter "s" to the word "year." In line 14, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "ten," and in the same line add the letter "s" to the word "year." In line 19, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "ten," and add the letter "s" to the word "year."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as pending, and the gentleman will be recognized to discuss it. The amendment will be voted on after the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is disposed of.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care whether I speak now or after the vote on the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary situation is this, that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio now has preference.

Mr. MADDEN. This would not interfere with that.

The CHAIRMAN. If his motion should be adopted, that would strike out the section.

Mr. MADDEN. I would not object to that. I would be glad to withhold my amendment and have it considered as pending, and let the vote be taken on the other motion.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for recognition two or three times.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not in order to perfect a section before the motion to strike out is put?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] or any other gentleman had, at the time the gentleman from Ohio offered his amendment, asked for recognition for the purpose of perfecting the section, he would have been given preference in recognition for that purpose; but the gentleman from Ohio offered his motion to strike out. There was no suggestion of any motion to perfect, and the gentleman from Ohio was recognized and discussed his amendment for five minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri spoke in opposition to it for five minutes. It seems to the Chair that in that situation the motion of the gentleman from Ohio now has precedence. Ordinarily the gentleman's statement of the rule is correct.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it the opinion of the Chair that it depends on whether or not the offer of the amendment to perfect the section is made before the motion to strike out? I understand the rule applies without reference to the time when the motion is made to strike out, and that if the motion is made to strike out, then at any time before the question is put it is in order to offer an amendment to perfect the section, and that amendments to perfect the section are acted upon first.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to take the floor to discuss my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has this impression about the matter, although he may be in error. The practice is as stated. Where the gentleman moves to strike out and receives recognition, if no motion is made to perfect the text and the amendment is discussed, then it seems to the Chair that that is first in order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand the rule to be that an amendment to perfect the section must be put before the motion to strike out.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. RUSSELL. The very purpose of the rule providing for a motion to perfect the section having precedence or putting the amendment to perfect the section before the motion to strike out is that it may be possible to avoid the striking out of the section. It might be that the motion would carry as the section now stands, but if the section should be perfected or amended it might not carry, as it might remove the objection. There is every reason why the vote should first be taken upon the amendment to perfect the section before the motion to strike out is put to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt about that as a general rule. But there is no point of order pending here, and without stopping to look it up the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois to discuss his amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, under the provision of section 311 any man injured in the service of his country while defending its honor would be compelled to make an application for compensation within one year or forever be debarred from the right to do so. If a man be killed in the service, under the provisions of this section his family would not be permitted to make an application for compensation as the result of his death unless they did it within a year. It is true that the commissioner would have the right to extend the time for an additional year, if good cause was shown why the time should be extended. But that puts the matter within the power of a single man to determine whether a man's disability entitles him to compensation.

Now, I submit that this is not just. The men who offer their lives to their country and by reason of having done that fight to preserve the Nation's honor are entitled to everything the country can give them in decency, and I submit that it is not unreasonable to say that a man ought to have the right within a period of 10 years to make an application to his Government to compensate him for the loss of an arm, or the loss of a leg, or any other injury that may be incurred as the result of service to his country.

The Government ought not to pretend to compensate these men and then cut them off from an opportunity to receive compensation, and that is exactly what this section of the bill does. It says that no man shall be compensated for any disability incurred as the result of his service to his country unless he makes an application within a year from that time. It also says that the family of no man who has served his country may apply after a year for compensation for his death.

The men who drew the bill pretend to be philanthropists; they advertise themselves all over the country as being in favor of doing justice to the citizens of the country, and yet when the question arises with respect to the injury of a man who has been drafted into the service of the Nation to fight the battles of the people of the country, to protect the honor of the Nation, and to preserve and to perpetuate American institutions, he is told that no matter how badly he may be injured in the service of the country that unless he applies within a year he has no claim against the Government.

This, gentlemen, is not in keeping with the spirit of American institutions. It is not fair to the man whose blood is spilled on the battle field, and I maintain that there ought not to be any limitation within which a man injured in the country's service should be to allowed to apply for compensation. But since the committee seems to be determined that there shall be but a single year allowed, I am willing to content myself by limiting the period to 10 years. If I had my way, there would be no limitation whatever.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Why limit it to 10 years?

Mr. MADDEN. I have just said that I would not limit it at all; I would strike out the section.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Why not vote on the motion to strike out? Why compromise on this proposition? Why make it 10 years? If it is wrong to let the statute of limitations run, why not throw the doors open and give them an opportunity to come in at all times?

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing to do that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] by inserting the word "three" where he has the figures "10," so that the limitation will be three years.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ALEXANDER moves to amend the amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN by inserting the word "three" instead of "10," in lines 12, 14, and 19, page 25.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the only effect of this amendment is to make the limitation 3 years instead of 10. Now, take the instance given by the gentleman from Kansas as the basis for his argument. He says if a man dies in a German hospital, why, his family should have 40 years in which to make their claim, because they could not otherwise have opportunity to do it. Now, I have no desire on earth to place unreasonable limitations upon the time when the application may be made. If a man dies in the service, of course, that will be known, and three years will be ample time in which to make the claim.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In a moment.

If he is injured in the service, they certainly can ascertain the fact within three years, and the only effect of extending the time is to open the doors for fraud; and if you consult the Pension Bureau you will find that has been the fact in previous wars. A man 10, 20, 30 years after the war contracts rheumatism or other diseases. Well, he may claim that that was of service origin. He may be in good faith; he may think it is true; but after the lapse of years it will be impossible to ascertain the fact.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield before he gets away from the German prison?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Is the German Emperor going to make report to us here that the man died there?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. LITTLE. Of course not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Of course the fact of his death will not depend on the Kaiser for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. There was a time fixed of 11 minutes. The gentleman from Kansas had part of that, but there is other time remaining. I ask to be recognized.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No one has spoken in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia was that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes—

Mr. DYER. I did not so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Which motion prevailed and the gentleman from Georgia himself occupied one minute, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] occupied five minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas occupied three minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri occupied one minute; and all time has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman from Georgia; that it was only on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] that that time was fixed. Since that time there have been two amendments offered, and I ask unanimous consent the time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time for debate on this amendment may be extended for five minutes and then closed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I consider the proposition in regard to this limitation of time in which a claim can be filed as one of the very great parts of this splendid bill. This bill has been drawn with the intention of guarding the honor of the men who must go to fight the battles of this great war. You gentlemen have shown that you are patriotic men here to-day. You have shown it in adopting the amendment of the splendid Representative from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and now, gentlemen, here is a proposition equally as important to say that the men who go out into France and fight for the honor and glory of this country, that the men who are brave enough to go, that you shall say to them and charge them in this bill impliedly with the fact that they may try to commit fraud upon this country in the years that are to come by presenting fictitious or false claims. That is the argument of my distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. He would have you believe that these men in years to come may present fraudulent claims against the Government to which they have given up their lives for the glory of the flag. Many of these men will come home, gentlemen, wounded and disabled, and they will have property perhaps that would take care of them for the next half dozen years or more, but the time will come, however, when on account of their disability they will no longer be able to make a living, and then they will come and ask of the Government that to which they are entitled and are entitled by reason of their services and by reason of this splendid bill.

The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, my colleague [Mr. ALEXANDER], ought both to be voted down. It is wrong, it is not proper, it is dishonorable to have them written in such a splendid measure as this.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Would not the putting of a brief limitation in the bill result, in the gentleman's opinion, in the filing of many special claims before Congress?

Mr. DYER. It would, no doubt, Mr. Chairman, result in many claims of that kind.

Mr. IGOE. If this limitation stays in here, will it not compel people to file claims now who are able to go on without calling on the Government?

Mr. DYER. Absolutely.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman say that the existence of the statute of limitations in all the States is a reflection upon every honest man that pays his debts?

Mr. DYER. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Where does he get any reflection upon any honest man?

Mr. DYER. It is a reflection on the honest soldiers who fight our battles. It is a reflection on the courage of the men who go out to fight those battles, and I will say to my colleague that there is no greater personal sacrifice that a man can make to this country than to go out now across the waters and face the armies of the central powers.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman does not have to say that to me. But does he say that the statute of limitations are wrong and a reflection upon men who pay their debts?

Mr. DYER. It is a reflection on the soldiers and sailors.

Mr. BORLAND. Do not dodge the question.

Mr. DYER. I am not talking about the statutes that pertain to civil matters and civil suits, but I am talking about claims presented against this Government in a bill that is written for patriotic men, women, and children. You say that this bill has been brought here in the interests of the soldiers and sailors of the Nation. I have taken the word of you gentlemen that it is true in every particular. I have said that the men who wrote this bill, the men who are responsible for it, and I care not who they are, are entitled to the credit of the Nation for bringing in so splendid a measure, in a general way.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not the gentleman believe it would be economical for the Government not to require hasty presentations of these bills? And why require them to be filed in one year? Probably many will not be filed for many years afterwards. It would probably save the Government a good deal of money.

Mr. DYER. My colleague is absolutely right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who served brilliantly and bravely in the Twentieth Kansas as its lieutenant colonel in the Philippines knows something about matters of this kind. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], who is the senior member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, knows about these things, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] knows that in many instances men will not present their claims until they are compelled to do so. Why? Because some gentlemen in this House and some people in this country say it is a disgrace for a soldier or sailor or a widow to come to the Government and ask for a pension. This bill provides for pensions, pensions that ought to be paid, pensions that ought to be allowed, and concerning which no time should be fixed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 66.

Mr. ADAMSON. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. MADDEN took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 74.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. We would like to hear the amendment read. What was the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois offered?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. KEY of Ohio and Mr. DYER demanded a division.

Mr. RAYBURN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAYBURN. What is this vote on?

The CHAIRMAN. On the Key amendment, to strike out the section.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 73.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks for tellers. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-one gentlemen have risen; a sufficient number. Tellers are ordered.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] will act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 314. That compensation under this article shall not be paid while the person is in receipt of service or retirement pay. Existing pension laws and laws providing for gratuities or payment in the event of death in the service shall not be applicable after the enactment of this amendment to persons now in or hereafter entering the military or naval service, except in so far as rights under any such law shall have heretofore accrued.

Compensation because of disability or death of members of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) shall be in lieu of any compensation for such disability or death under the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire sympathy with the compensation provisions of this bill, and I think, in view of the fact that this is a most revolutionary proposition, it is remarkable that so few of the minor features of this bill have been amended.

However, there are certain fundamental principles involved in this bill which should receive the careful and intelligent consideration of the membership of this House. One of those fundamentals was amended by the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. There are two others. One is, Is the Government ready to commit itself for all time to the life insurance business? Another is, Is the optional feature of this bill just and equitable to all the enlisted men and drafted men in the Army of the United States?

It is stated by the actuary of the War Department that only 25 per cent of the men in the armies of the United States will avail themselves of the insurance provided in this bill, and they in sums of from $1,000 to $2,500. If that is true, we are giving a gratuity—for that is what it amounts to—of $50 a thousand to those men who have knowledge of life insurance and knowledge of business methods and would have the money to buy this insurance. We are giving, let us say, a gratuity of $250 on a policy of $5,000. But to some one who has not the business knowledge, or sufficient knowledge of this business, at least, to avail himself of this insurance we give only $50; and if he does not apply for it we give him nothing.

Now, I am in favor of giving a life insurance policy to each soldier and sailor of the United States in the sum of $3,000, enlisted men and officers alike. [Applause.] When they offer themselves to the service of the country, I am in favor of placing in their hands a policy for $3,000, not waiting until the soldier or sailor applies for it, because, according to the figures of the actuaries of the War Department, not more than 25 per cent of the men in the Army and Navy of the United States will avail themselves of this insurance, and this is discriminatory and unfair.

I propose to offer an amendment to section 4, providing that the sum of $3,000 shall be paid to every man who is killed or who dies from disease contracted while in the service of the United States. If I still have the time, Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer or to have read in my time an amendment to section 4 of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Page 27, strike out all of section 400 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 400. That to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister of every commissioned officer and enlisted man and of every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) who dies during the present war or within two years after its termination, as the result of injury received or disability contracted while serving with the military or naval forces of the United States, in the line of duty, there shall be paid the sum of $3,000 in monthly installments to be prescribed by regulations."

The CHAIRMAN. Is it to be read merely for information?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, we have not reached that yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 26, line 14, all the language beginning with the word "existing," in line 14, and ending with the word "accrued," in line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas: Page 26, line 14, strike out all of the language beginning with the word "existing," in line 14, and ending with the word "accrued," in line 19.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, earlier in the day this motion would not have been in keeping with the provisions of the bill, but as the bill has been amended this language has now no place in it. I submit this to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I submit that that is the very heart of the bill that the gentleman proposes to strike out. We intend that this shall be in lieu of the pension.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But we have already provided for pensions in this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. We certainly have, and it will not interfere with them in the least. We want this law, as it says here, to apply to men now in the service or hereafter in lieu of pensions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But we have amended this bill so that the men now in the service will receive pensions.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; we have not. In this law are provisions whereby the soldier can receive this compensation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, it is not compensation. You can not compensate men for the kind of service these men are rendering.

Mr. RAYBURN. Nobody expects that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then let us not call it that.

Mr. RAYBURN. The one sole purpose of this bill is to try to get away from the pension system and substitute this for it. That is why this section is placed here as to the men in the Army now and hereafter in the Army.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, you can not pay for military service, service in the face of shot and shell, service in the face of asphyxiating gases, service that takes the bravest of the brave, whether voluntary or service that is compelled under conscription, at $30 a month. You can not pay for that kind of service by calling it compensation, as is done in this bill. [Applause.] You can not change the nature of military service and place it on the same level as service in the industries of the country.

This bill was drafted by a man who may know something about sociology, who has studied the question of compensation for those injured in industrial pursuits; but evidently he has no comprehension of military service or he would not have used the word "compensation" for such service as volunteer and conscripted men render at $30 a month and then give them for total disability—total blindness, the loss of both legs or both arms—as he proposed, $40 a month—

Mr. REAVIS. And under a one-year statute of limitation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And under a one-year statute of limitation. Why, if the gentlemen in charge of this bill think they are right when they say that the very purpose is from now on in this Republic to strike out the word "pensions" and insert the word "compensation," and place military service upon the same basis as service in a shoe factory, which is voluntary, they have misconstrued the nature of service in the military and naval forces of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman takes that position now, I have misconstrued the texture of his mind heretofore. Does the gentleman mean to say he wants a man to be paid under this law and under another law? That is all this part of the bill refers to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; I am answering the gentleman's statement that it is the purpose from now on to place payments for disabilities in the military and naval service of the United States upon the same basis as compensation under existing laws for injuries incurred in shoe factories and woolen mills.

Mr. RAYBURN. I certainly was very candid when I made my remarks on this bill, in saying, as I now say, that we intend this to be in lieu of pensions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that, but I do not believe the country is with the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, we will have a roll call on this after a while to see whether the House is or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, there are some things in this bill that make it necessary that it should pass. There are many things in this bill that are objectionable that will be out of it before it becomes a law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I think there is confusion about the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas. He has argued many questions that are wholly irrelevant to the question at issue. I do not care whether you call this compensation or pension. That is beside the question; but section 314 provides—

That compensation under this article shall not be paid while the person is in receipt of service or retirement pay.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That ought to remain in.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It also provides that—

Existing pension laws and laws providing for gratuities or payment in the event of death in the service shall not be applicable after the enactment of this amendment to persons now in or hereafter entering the military or naval service, except in so far as rights under any such law shall have heretofore accrued.

For instance, since this war began rights may have accrued under the old pension laws; it is to save those rights that the provision quoted is written into the law; but, as to rights that may accrue hereafter, they shall be measured under this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Just on the dead level, does the gentleman from Missouri believe that we ought to inaugurate here to-day a policy that would place those who in the future render military service, either voluntary or compulsory, for the United States on the same level as those who volunteer to work in a shoe factory and are injured there?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why, no.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what this bill is doing.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no. Let us talk about this amendment that you propose. You intend that the soldier who serves in this war shall not only receive a pension, if you please, under the provisions of this bill, but in addition to that the pension provided for by existing law.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is just what your amendment would do, and I think in that you are laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto do now close. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 315. That if an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this act 's caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States or the enemy to pay damages therefor, the director, as a condition to payment of compensation by the United States, shall require the beneficiary to assign to the United States any right of action he may have to enforce such liability of such other person or any right which he may have to share in any money or other property received in satisfaction of such liability of such other person. The cause of action so assigned to the United States may be prosecuted or compromised by the director and any money realized thereon shall be placed to the credit of the compensation fund.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that debate on the section and all amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE IV.

INSURANCE.

SEC. 400. That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department the opportunity to secure upon equitable terms greater or broader protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in Article III, the United States, upon application to the bureau and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against the death or total disability of any such person in any multiple of $500, and not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, upon the payment of the premiums as hereinafter provided.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 27, line 23, strike out the words "the opportunity to secure on equitable terms."

The committee amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

On page 27, line 24, strike out the words "or broader."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 28, line 4, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will disagree to that amendment and allow it to stand as originally written in the bill at $10,000.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question in regard to a section which has just been passed over, section 315, which provides that if an injury or death occurs which is not the result of the fault of the United States, or the enemy, that the right of action shall be transferred to the United States.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill this question: Suppose the soldiers are being moved by rail from San Antonio to some cantonment, say, in Mississippi or elsewhere, and any number of them are killed by the gross negligence or carelessness of those engaged in the operation of the train. The railroad would clearly be liable for the injury or for the death. In some States of the Union compensation where death results from gross carelessness or negligence the recovery may be as large as $30,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. For death?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know of any State where there is any such sum recoverable.

Mr. HELM. Well, say, $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000. Under such a case as that where the person has a clear, well-defined, clean-cut cause of action for death, under the provisions of this section that right would be transferred to the United States and the United States would prosecute and recover maybe $10,000 or $20,000, or whatever sum it may be. That sum would be placed to the credit of the compensation fund under the provisions of section 315. Now, I do not think it would be right or just or proper for a soldier who lost his life in such a manner as that, where the cause of action gave him a substantial right to recovery of a sum much larger and in excess of the provisions of this bill, to have it go into the compensation fund and credited to the United States instead of the family of the injured or deceased soldier. It looks to me like an unjust and unfair and unwise provision. In many cases it would operate as a substantial profit to the United States. Any excess amount accruing for such death or injury recovered by the United States should be paid to the soldier injured or, in case of death, to those entitled thereto by this act.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky there may be instances where that would result in injustice, but this bill undertakes to compensate for the injuries received by the act for which he may have a cause of action. The party who claims under the provisions of the law for injury that may result in disability or death is required to assign his cause of action against the railroad company or against the enemy. Now, there are very few cases that I know where the party injured gets any $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Of course, I have not had the extended experience the gentleman from Missouri has in the practice of law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Compensation for death under the law of Missouri is $5,000, or was when I was familiar with the law. We will think about the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky. It seems to have much merit.

Mr. GREGG. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET].

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia did not tell us why the committee abandoned its amendment, but I think we can all guess, and I think this illustrates what I said at the beginning and which the gentleman from Georgia rather took umbrage at—that it is unfortunate for the House that we are not getting in this bill the independent and unbiased judgment of the committee.

But I wish to say a word about the financial result of this bill in connection with this amendment. Now, the provision for family allowances, according to the table which the committee gives us, will cost the second year $190,000,000, and will not be less for many years. The compensation for death will cost $22,000,000. The compensation for total disability will cost $35,000,000, and the compensation for partial disability will cost $21,000,000, making a total of $268,000,000 for one year. Then we have our present pension bill, which this year is $160,000,000. Suppose that falls off faster than we expect; suppose it goes to $132,000,000. That will make, in round numbers, for the year after next $400,000,000 which we will be paying for pensions or for compensation, call it what we please. Now, in addition to that comes this proposition of insurance. This proposition is in addition to the $400,000,000 which the committee's own figures show we will have to pay. Now, can the Government afford to pay it? Of course, we all want to be liberal.

We would all like to give $1,000 instead of $100 to a man who loses his eyesight, and that would not be adequate compensation. We would all like to increase this compensation all through, for we know that no matter how large we make the payments we can not adequately compensate for what they lose; but in figuring the amount we must be governed by what the resources of the Government will allow on the one side and the deserts of the men on the other, which we know we never can meet, no matter how much we pay, and therefore we have got to compromise between the two; and it seems to me that with the $400,000,000 that we are pledged under this bill it is unwise to add this additional insurance, because by these same figures that the committee give us, if the insurance is $10,000, if every soldier in the Army took it—and if it is a good thing we want them all to take it; we do not want a few to get the benefit of it and not all—if every soldier in the Army took it out, according to the figures published by the committee it would cost in the second year $1,800,000,000 in addition to the $400,000,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLET. I have not the time, otherwise I would be glad to do so.

Mr. LITTLE. That would be 10 per cent of what we have spent this year.

Mr. GILLET. On pensions?

Mr. LITTLE. No.

Mr. GILLET. We have got to pay that $1,800,000,000 in addition to all we are paying now. That would keep growing from year to year, for, despite the statements in the hearings, it does not seem to me so much would be payable the second year. The fundamental trouble is that this is really a pension or compensation just as much as what we call our total disability or death allowance is a pension. There a man gets a certain amount a month, but the Government pays the premium.

In this case the Government only pays seven-eighths of the premium and the man pays one-eighth, so that this premium is really so much extra compensation and is a mere addition to that clause of the bill, and it seems to me we can not afford to pay $1,800,000,000 a year more. The only argument they can make is that we will not have to pay that because all men will not elect to pay the premium. In my opinion all the soldiers should be treated alike. I do not think a shrewd provident man who sees it is a good investment should get it and a man who was not shrewd enough to see it be left out. That would produce a state of dissatisfaction which in a few years would probably compel legislation to put all on the same footing. Now, who would be apt to take out this insurance? In the first place, all the men of middle age would be so much more benefitted by such insurance than would the young men that they would practically all insure. There are in the Regular Army thousands of officers and men between 45 and 64, to whom this feature would be most attractive. They would get insurance for life far below its actual value. Then the men of means in the service and the officers to whom the monthly premiums would mean little would all be likely to insure; but when it comes to the great mass of the Army, the young men, hopeful, careless, improvident, liking their spending money, it is impossible to predict their course. It would probably depend somewhat upon the influence of their commanding officers. Those who had captains who would keep impressing on them the importance of insuring would follow the advice; those who were left to themselves would not. And thus it would be left largely to chance and after the war there would be disabled veterans and bereaved families in the same neighborhood receiving different compensations. Some would think they were discriminated against—they were treated unfairly and instead of the equality which it is our purpose to establish and which alone would permit future supplementary legislation there will be dissatisfaction and discontent. We must not forget that this insurance feature is in addition to the other compensation and that it is really supplementary compensation but is not applied equally. All compensation for death or total disability might be called insurance, the Government paying all the premiums. It appeared in these hearings that the minimum compensation to a widow is equivalent to $6,500 of life insurance, while her maximum equals $35,000. In case of disability from injury, a soldier's minimum allowance of $40 has a present value of $10,000 while the maximum is $33,000. The only difference is that there the Government pays all the premiums and all the soldiers get the insurance, here the Government pays seven-eighths of the premiums and only a part of the soldiers get it. I think that while the bill as a whole is liberal and commendable the insurance feature as here presented is unfair, unequal, will strain the resources of the country, and is an unwise innovation in the interest of a part of the soldiers only.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, can not we agree upon the time for debate on this section?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman from Georgia consent to the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts being extended five minutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to agree first upon time for debate on this section. How much time can we agree on?

Mr. LITTLE. I want five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of 30 minutes the debate close on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there are many amendments which Members wish to propose and it would take a much longer time than 30 minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Reserving the right to object, did the gentleman arrange five minutes for me on my amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of 40 minutes the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman give me five minutes? I have been trying to get five minutes all day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can not the gentleman make it an hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at the expiration of 40 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the motion. I wish to amend, by moving that the debate close in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment that all debate close in one hour.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion pending before the committee is the committee amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] will be recognized on the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak in favor of the amendment. There seem to be two angles to the opposition to this insurance feature. One is from the gentlemen who believe that the insurance ought to be given to every soldier, whether he applies for it or not, and without any contribution or premium paid on his part; and the other is just exactly the opposite pole, who believe that there ought to be no insurance and ought to be no opportunity for insurance, and that no man ought to have more than that which is given in the way of compensation or death claims. Now, the committee, or the draftsmen of this bill, seem to have wisely steered between Scylla and Charybdis of these two objections. It would be as unwise as it is unnecessary to give every soldier in the million or two million of men who may be called to the colors $5,000 or $10,000 insurance without any contribution on his part. As the gentleman from Kansas pointed out a few minutes ago, a large number of those men will be single men, without any particular dependents, who leave parents behind amply able to take care of themselves—just the young men of the family, who go out without anything except their hats when they leave the family home.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] has well said that this act will cost a great deal of money. Under the view that every soldier in the Army will be given insurance, it would certainly bankrupt any government on earth, and it seems to me amazing that men have gotten up seriously on the floor and suggested that kind of a proposition. But it is perfectly manifest there will be men in the Army, and possibly an increasing number of them as subsequent drafts occur, who will have special obligations upon them which will not be met by the ordinary compensation in this bill. They may be obligations in favor of dependent relatives who really are not within the legal classes of dependents, and yet they are real moral obligations upon the man.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. For a brief question.

Mr. LONERGAN. In view of the spirit of guardianship running through this bill, does not the gentleman feel that the United States Government should see to it that all enlisted men receive an equal amount of insurance under this Article IV?

Mr. BORLAND. No; unless I fail to make myself clear to the gentleman. I do not think it is necessary for every enlisted man to have an equal amount of insurance. The very science of insurance, to my mind, lies in the fact that gives a man a chance to protect particular obligations that are personal to him, and I do not think we could take any body of men, even the men in this House, and apply any ironclad, uniform, 6-foot rule to their obligations for insurance. We can do that as far as compensation laws are concerned and as far as pension laws are concerned, but they do not reach all of the obligations a man wants to protect.

We are taking away from a large number of these young men who are going out of offices and stores and other places of business not only the right they have to take insurance, the opportunity for them to take insurance, but in some cases we are actually cancelling the insurance for them. Now, those men have thought enough of the obligations they have had to take the insurance voluntarily before they went into the Army.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that debate on this amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. Not until the end of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. We are taking away from them the opportunity which they had to take insurance. Now, I think in fairness that we owe them the opportunity to take insurance under the regulations of this bill. I do not think gentlemen can seriously urge here that we ought to impose insurance upon every man who goes into the Army, either at his expense or without his expense, because there will be, I hope, 90 per cent who will not have any special obligation beyond what can be answered by the compensation features of this bill.

Mr. LONERGAN. Is not one of the chief purposes of article 4 to forestall service pension legislation?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know whether it is or not. It is not, to my mind. But I think that anything that will discharge the obligations of the man who has to meet the real sufferings of the war ought to forestall pension legislation of the future. If we can meet the need of the war when the need occurs, we ought to forestall pension legislation, and we will have done a humane act in so doing. I simply want to say that the committee is right in placing this upon a voluntary basis and not placing it absolutely uniform upon all men in the service, and yet giving the man in some degree the opportunity when he is in the Army that he would have to protect his special obligations in private life.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I thought the committee amendment substituted "$5,000" for "$10,000," and that that carried.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that carried. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. IGoe, page 27, line 19, after the word "that," strike out the balance of the section and insert the following: "That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and to the Navy Nurse Corps (female), when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department, greater protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in Article III, the United States during war, without any charge and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against death or total disability of every person in the sum of $5,000.

"Such insurance shall terminate 120 days after the war during which it is granted, or if the insured shall have been discharged or shall resign from the service prior to that time it shall terminate 120 days after such discharge or resignation: Provided, however, That a dishonorable or bad conduct discharge from the service shall immediately terminate such insurance: And provided further, That such termination shall not affect the liability of the United States to pay for death or total disability occurring prior to such termination.

"The United States, prior to the termination of such insurance as herein provided, upon the application of the insured to the bureau, and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against death or total disability of any such person in any multiple of $500 and not less than $1,000 or more than $5,000, in such form or forms of insurance and with such provisions for premium payments as may be provided by regulation."

Mr. IGoe. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment. I would like to understand what it is. A gentleman was talking with me and diverted my attention. I understand there is a provision in that to change this into the form of a bonus instead of paying some premium. Is that a fact?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands not.

Mr. IGOE. Do I understand a point of order is made?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did reserve a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IGOE. If a point of order is to be made, I want it to be made now.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand there is no premium in it. Is that true?

Mr. IGOE. It is insurance.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] comes too late. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] had begun to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the amendment provides to give a bonus of any part of it, it seems to me it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman's proposition gives the insured $50, and I want to give him $57. That is the difference between us.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. IGOE. It gives insurance.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is the very contrary of insurance, no matter what the language is, if it proposes to make an additional gift to the soldier. It is not insurance at all. It is the very antipodes of insurance.

Mr. IGOE. What does the gentleman mean by insurance?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is a contract whereby for a certain stipulated premium you agree to insure men against certain contingencies. If you propose to give it to the soldiers, it is an additional bonus, and it is not insurance at all. It changes the entire form and substance of the matter, and it is not germane at all to this section. It changes the entire character and scheme of the insurance plan.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN. Is not the same principle involved under the compensation feature in article 3?

Mr. ADAMSON. Not at all.

Mr. LONERGAN. Well, what is the difference?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, in the bill itself it is provided that the soldier shall get, only 120 days after the passage of this act, this insurance that the gentleman speaks about without paying a cent. What is the difference between such a proposition as that and giving it to all of them? I extend the 120-day limit until 120 days after the war.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the Chair pleases, all the Government proposes in this bill to do is to undo the injury done these people by depriving them of their insurability to the amount of $50. It proposes to make good and to restore the insurability only. The insurance companies charge a differential of an additional $50 per thousand by reason of the war. The Government recognizes the obligation to remove the differential that it has inflicted on the man, and it insures him on the ordinary normal basis that would exist if he were not in the war. I understand the gentleman's amendment proposes to change the whole plan of that, and, in addition to restoring the soldier's insurability, the Government will give the soldier a certain amount.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair wishes to hear a word against the point of order, it seems to me the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] gives away the whole case that this amendment is subject to a point of order when he says that under the present law the Government pays—I do not think he said what portion, but it is practically seven-eighths of the insurance, and the man pays one-eighth.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not say a word about the present law. I said we were restoring what we had taken away from the man, what is not covered by the contract at all, and then, having restored the basis of insurability, we make a contract of insurance, just as though his insurability had not been affected by the war.

Mr. GILLET. That is exactly what I refer to. I meant under the bill as it now stands.

Now, under the bill as it now stands the Government pays seven-eighths of the insurance and the man pays one-eighth. That being so, it certainly would be in order to say that the Government should pay six-eighths or five-eighths or four-eighths, because it is right along the same line. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri provides that the Government shall pay eight-eighths. He may have other provisions in his amendment.

Mr. IGOE. It is all in the same section. It provides that for a certain time there shall be no charge, and then it provides that there shall be a charge afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Georgia had an opportunity to examine the amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I have not. My understanding of the amendment is that in addition to restoring the soldier's insurability it is proposed to give him some benefit. That changes the entire character of the bill.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will permit the Chair at this point, it seems to the Chair that the only difference between the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri and the text of the act is in substance that the text of the act provides that the soldier shall have insurance on the payment of a premium, as hereinafter provided, while the gentleman's amendment provides that he shall have insurance without paying anything.

Mr. ADAMSON. The difficulty is that while you call it "insurance" it is not insurance at all. When you give it to him it is simply a donation. It changes the entire character of the transaction.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to speak on this amendment, except to say that—

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds further I would like very much to have the amendment read again. I think the Members of the House would like to hear it.

Mr. IGOE. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that it is printed in yesterday's proceedings, on the last page of yesterday's proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that there is a word omitted in the copy which I gave to the Clerk, and that I should like to insert it. Where it says "every person in the sum of $5,000" it should be "every such person."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] as to the Government giving any part of this insurance, I wish to say that the Government is giving the men no part of this insurance. The Government is simply insuring the men at the rate of $8 a thousand from the ages of 21 to 31; and upon the proposition about the Government giving seven-eighths of the premium, I want to say that that is incorrect, for the simple reason that the Government is giving him nothing. The Government simply says that it will insure him for an average rate of $8 a thousand.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not experience show, as stated in the hearings, that the losses will be $75 on each thousand for death and $50 on each thousand for disability?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; it does that, of course.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is the same thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is divided into various titles, one of which is compensation, and another of which is insurance. If the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] is adopted, it is relieved of the insurance feature and becomes compensation. In other words, it goes back to the compensation title, and adds so much to the compensation already fixed, if the man happens to die during the war, and certainly that would not be in order as a part of the insurance feature.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will make this inquiry—the Chair is very anxious to reach a right conclusion on this matter: Would it be in order to strike out the words "upon the payment of the premiums as hereinafter provided" in lines 4 and 5 on page 28?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it would. I think it would destroy the character of the insurance entirely and make it something entirely different and not germane at all to this article.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not agree with the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss the point of order a moment, and make one suggestion in that regard. As I caught the reading of this amendment, it proposes to give every soldier in the ranks insurance without payment on his part. That turns it into a species of pension on death. In another portion of the bill provision is made for the payment of compensation upon death in the service, and this would be cumulative compensation for death.

Mr. IGOE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. In this same article you provide that everybody who dies before 120 days after the passage of this law shall be considered to have applied for this insurance. Now, is that a gift? Or is that insurance?

Mr. BORLAND. That is apparently a part of the contract.

Mr. IGOE. Who makes the contract?

Mr. BORLAND. The Government.

Mr. IGOE. The Government makes it with itself. The man does not have to do anything.

Mr. BORLAND. The Government could say in its contract of insurance that the insurance should continue a certain length of time after default in the payment, and that is a part of the terms of the contract.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I have not concluded my statement to the Chair.

Mr. LONERGAN. Does the gentleman notice that in the proposed amendment it is provided that this insurance may continue after the termination of the war on an optional plan, for the men who are discharged from the service?

Mr. BORLAND. In the proposed amendment?

Mr. LONERGAN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN. That is what we would like to have the Chair bear in mind, that it is not any proposition to abolish the insurance feature of the bill. It is provided in this proposed amendment that the insurance be furnished during the period of the war to men and women in the service without the payment of any premium, and after the termination of the war that it be upon the optional insurance plan, as provided in article 4.

Mr. BORLAND. Then the gentleman admits that but for that option, and if the option is not exercised, it is a perfectly free donation. It is not insurance at all.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make just one suggestion. We are not dealing with terms. It makes no difference whether this in effect would be compensation. It does not change the condition of affairs. The Chair was exactly right when he suggested a moment ago that this is equivalent to saying that an amendment providing for the omission of the payment of the premium would be germane. Of course, everybody knows that it would, and this is the proposition: Certainly it is germane to reduce the amount required, and if it is proper to reduce it in any sum, it is proper to reduce it entirely. If the thing is to be granted by the Government, a change of the terms on which it may be granted by the Government is always germane. There is no avoidance of the logic of that, as it seems to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I was just going to say, is not the future service to be rendered by the soldier during the period that the insurance runs in and of itself a premium which he pays for the insurance which is afforded him?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not go into any elaborate statement of the reasons for the conclusion that he will announce. It seems quite clear to the Chair that the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Igou], while it may change the purpose that the committee had in mind in reporting the bill, at the same time is not in violation of the rule of germaneness in any way. The Chair thinks the amendment is germane, and overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Igou] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in offering this amendment is to try to make this insurance feature one that will work justly and equitably. I feel satisfied that the proposition of the committee will not work out in that way. My colleague [Mr. BORLAND] urges as one objection against this provision that there are men in the service who have no families. Now, this proposition in this article is not only life insurance but it is total-disability insurance, in the committee proposition as well as in the proposition that I have suggested to the House.

Now, if a man pays insurance, or receives it, and has not a relative mentioned in the committee amendment, his people will not get it, either under my amendment or the committee amendment. But it surely is of interest to the soldier to know that the Government will provide every member of his family with insurance and provide himself with the total-disability insurance. I am afraid that the proposition the committee suggests will not work out equitably for this reason: In the very start it creates two classes; all those in the service and up to 120 days after the passage of the act are deemed to have taken this insurance, and I agree with that proposition, but I want to carry it further and carry it to the end of the war, and carry it after the war, so that when the men return home, if they want to take insurance, let them do so and pay a fair premium to the Government for it.

Suppose a man under the committee amendment does not take insurance in the 120 days, what can he do? He is absolutely debarred from receiving insurance at any time during the service or after the service. Take the case of two men going into the war—

Mr. BORLAND. I am going to move to strike out the 120 days.

Mr. IGOE. I am talking about the proposition of the committee. These two men go into the trenches; both are killed; each one had a wife; and one of them took insurance and the other did not. The wife of the one who took insurance gets $35 a month under the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] and $25 a month from the insurance, and the widow of the one who did not apply for insurance gets only $35 a month. How can you explain that to these two widows in the same neighborhood? After all, will it not depend a good deal upon the officers as to whether the men are induced within the 120 days to take out insurance? The officer who is careful and considerate will advise the men to take insurance, but the officer who is engrossed in other things will not do so and the chances are that his men will not take insurance.

Now, take this case: We say that we deprive these men of insurability when we send them into the war. There are thousands of these men who when they come out, even though not disabled sufficiently to get compensation under the law, will be disabled enough so that they will not be able to get insurance from any of the old-line life insurance companies. Is it not the duty of the Government to see that the men who went into the war strong and able bodied shall have the right to take out insurance when they come home, even though they can not get it from the insurance companies? Should they not be permitted to take it from the Government?

Gentlemen argue that it will cost a great deal of money. The only difference is about $3 a month, if their figures are correct. It amounts to an increase of about $3 a month in the salary or pay of a soldier. Now, let me ask you this: Suppose a boy does take this insurance and pays the premium for several months and then forgets or neglects to pay another premium, are you going to deprive his people of insurance? I do not think so, and it will not be long before a special bill is introduced.

Suppose a man dies within 120 days and gets his insurance and another man dies within 150 days after the bill becomes a law and has not applied for it. They both live in the same neighborhood. One family gets the insurance and the other people are deprived of it. How are you going to explain it? I believe that we ought to give these men insurance in an equal amount, and to all of them. If you want to make it compulsory, deduct it from their pay. If you do not, give it to all alike; if you leave it optional you create classes and you create inequalities, and it will be followed in the future by a flood of special bills that you can not refuse to pass.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask to address the House for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the committee for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have just received a telegram calling me out of the city on an important matter. I regret that it will not be possible for me to be here on the final passage of the bill. I wish to state that while I am opposed to certain features of the bill, there are some features which I regard as wise and good, and had it been possible for me to be here on the passage of the bill I should have voted for it. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, if I had gotten recognition before the vote was taken on the committee amendment I should have spoken in favor of the committee amendment to make the amount that a man could take of insurance $5,000 instead of $10,000. One of the reasons why I would have done that is in line with some of the arguments that have been made in the House on that proposition. Men have argued that we were setting up an insurance bureau in which a man would be discriminated against; that the private soldier would perhaps take a small amount and the rich soldier could take all of his insurance; that the private could only take $1,000 or $2,000 or, perhaps, $5,000, while the officer could take $10,000. For that reason I would have voted and did vote for the committee amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. What does the gentleman think of the converse of the proposition, an amendment to give the wealthy men all of it?

Mr. RAYBURN. I was coming to that. I know there will not be a private soldier in the Army who can not take $5,000.

Why, it would cost him only $40 a year; that will be $3.33 a month. If he is in the foreign service he is required to send back home one-half of his pay. Deducting his insurance he has more than $13 for spending money. They say that it is too much to take away from him; that it is too much to require that he pay this insurance policy, and yet that great leader in Europe, Gen. Pershing, says that $13 per month for a soldier in the trenches over there is too much money for the morale of the Army, and that $10 per month is the limit that a man ought to have to maintain the democracy in the Army that we should have. Therefore, I say that every man in the Army can take $5,000 and not deny himself of anything that he ought to have. Now, what about the motion of the gentleman from Missouri? He said that he wants to do the soldier justice, that we take from him his insurability, and that we ought to restore that insurability. That is what we do in this bill. What does the motion of the gentleman from Missouri do? The motion of the gentleman from Missouri insures this man during the war and 120 days after the war and then turns him out—

Mr. IGOE. Oh, no.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; it does.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman's amendment states that 120 days after the war the insurance shall terminate.

Mr. IGOE. But he may apply during that 120 days and the Government give insurance. This bill does so, too.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yet these young men will be mustered out of service all over America, maybe in some other parts of the world. They will forget they must apply for this insurance within 120 days. They have contracted some kind of disease, perhaps, perhaps so slight that he can not even get compensation under this law, and yet we have taken away from them this Government insurance, and that young man will be deprived of this insurance and will be deprived of the opportunity to take insurance in an old-line company, because he will be so impaired that they will not have him. That is the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. I say that this insurance should not be a gratuity; that the Government should charge this man what he could have gotten this insurance for if we had not destroyed that insurability by taking him out of the regular walks of life and putting him into this hazardous employment. After the war, under this bill, the man can carry on this yearly-term insurance or convert that policy into another policy that can be paid up, or it will be extended for a number of years. I say you can not do the soldiers that we are sending to the battle fronts of Europe a greater injustice than to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. We would be doing them an injustice, in that the military experts say that $16.50 would be too much money for them associating alongside of men who are not getting half that much money when we are trying to fight for the democracy of the world, and yet we are destroying the democracy in the trenches. The gentleman's amendment would do worse than that. One hundred and twenty days after this war, if these young men do not stand here at this bureau ready to again apply for insurance, they would not have one dollar of insurance in the Government. It does not provide for a man coming back after insurance, when no other company will take him when he is impaired. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is not well considered; it will not do the soldier justice, and I trust it will be voted down.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the amendment which I send up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers it as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE as an amendment to the Igoe amendment: Page 28, line 5, after the word "provided," strike out the period and insert "but every enlisted man who has or shall have during the war a wife, a child or children, a parent or parents dependent or partially dependent upon him, is hereby granted, without charge and without application, an insurance of $2,000 against total disability or death in or from injuries received in battle or in any attack by or engagement with the enemy; and this sum shall be paid to him in case of total disability and in case of death to his wife, and to his child or children if there be no wife, and to his parent or parents if there be neither wife nor children."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair makes the same decision.

Mr. BORLAND. That it is not an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order to offer a substitute for the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I offer a substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] really had a prior promise of recognition in order to offer a substitute.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] offers an amendment by way of a substitute, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DEMPSEY offers the following substitute:

ARTICLE IV.—INSURANCE.

Sec. 400. That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department greater protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in Article III, the United States, without medical examination, shall grant insurance against the death or total disability of any such person in the active war service. Any person on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who, while in such service becomes or has become totally disabled or dies, or has died, shall be deemed to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die before he shall have secured 120 such installments the balance of such 120 monthly installments shall be paid, but only if and while there survive him a wife, child, or widowed mother, and in that event the amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between them as may be provided by regulations. The insurance shall not be assignable and shall not be subject to the claims of creditors of the insured or of the beneficiary. The insurance shall be payable only in installments. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries of such insurance without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein or as in the regulations provided. The United States shall bear the expenses of administration and the mortality and disability cost.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment takes the language of the bill and simply eliminates certain of the words. The effect of it is this, that every man is insured in the amount of $3,000, and the basis of the argument in favor of that is this, that a distinction is not to be made between men because one man is provident, one man is saving, one man is thrifty, and another—no matter how brave, how reckless he may be in the face of danger when his country is imperiled, is not saving and not thrifty—shall not be deprived of a benefit extended to his fellows. Now, it is estimated, as I understand it, that only one out of four men, on the average, will take this insurance. Perhaps the majority who do not take it may be, every one of them, better soldiers than the man who does take it. Perhaps every one of the three may be more daring, more resolute, and more devoted to their country, and yet they may not be thrifty or parsimonious or saving. Perhaps the three men may have dependents who claim a part of their earnings from month to month. Perhaps the one may have private means with no one dependent upon him at all. Are you going to say that you are going to pay to these men—for in the end it is all pay; it is compensation for risking life and limb, and that is all it is—are you going to say that you are going to measure their pay not by devotion to country, not by loyalty, not by service, but by two other things: by the question of whether the soldier is thrifty or saving, or the question of whether or not he has dependents and is unable to take this insurance?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman will notice that the amendment that I offered provided only payment to men who were killed or injured in battle. There was no provision for anything except for men who fought and got killed or injured.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not know about the gentleman's amendment, but I know my amendment strikes out of this bill only the language that compels a contribution. I know that it leaves the language in the bill unaltered except in that particular. I know that it leaves all men alike; and I know that under this bill as drawn, when this war is over and when these men come back, the man who perhaps was the poorest soldier and who had no dependents will have obtained insurance, while the man who was the braver soldier and stood more resolutely in the face of danger will come to Congress and say "I served equally well, but I could not save the $8 a month." I know that he would come to Congress with such force in his argument, such persuasiveness, that Congress will say, "These men fought equally well for their country and deserve equally well of their Government." We should not make this unjust and inequitable distinction. We should give them all an equal benefit from their imperiling life and limb.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. As to the man who comes back from Europe diseased, but not disabled, is it the idea that the Government shall carry his insurance when the war is over?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It was not contemplated by my amendment, but it can easily be changed to take care of that situation. That can easily be provided for by leaving in one sentence that I left out.

My whole idea, I am frank to say, is this, that the Government should not embark on the business of insurance beyond the period of the war. It should not embark on the insurance business except for total disability or death, which is what is in the heading and the first lines of this measure. That is what it is designed this measure shall protect against, and I think when the war is over, when a man has not been totally disabled and has not died, we should not continue this insurance business, generally speaking. It is my idea that the Government should not embark in business; that it should leave business to individuals. My idea is that you will have provided amply for the situation when you have provided for these two things that are in the contemplation of Congress during the period of the war.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have read the contention of the private insurance companies, and I take it from the course of the gentleman's argument that that is his view.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not know about the argument of the private insurance companies, but I am entirely willing to have the insurance feature after the war substituted and made a part of my amendment. But I am not well enough versed in insurance law, and I am not sufficiently acquainted with insurance, either as to actuaries' figures or other details, to be sure whether we should continue the insurance after the war. But I am well enough versed in the matter to say this: You should not say to four men, one of whom is thrifty and prudent and the three others careless, who can not save anything, "I will give three of you men nothing, and to the other man I will give $50 on every thousand of insurance he chooses to take." That does not require any particular knowledge of insurance law or any particular study of the question as to basic facts on which insurance stands. That requires only the application of common sense and equity and justice.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But the gentleman's view is that we should discriminate in favor of the one man; in other words, that the Government should not insure any one of them after the period of the war?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No. I said expressly that the Government should not take that position.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is the sixth legislative day that we have occupied our time in considering this bill. The attendance at the committee sessions has been larger in considering this bill than in the consideration of any bill that has been before the Congress in several months. We have carefully considered the bill in all its aspects and phases, and we find the spirit of governmental guardianship throughout the measure. We say to the men that if they allot a certain sum of money we will make a certain allowance, and we provide for them in case of partial and total disability, and we provide for their dependents in case of death.

We are considering the insurance article of this bill. The gentlemen who appeared before the committee when the bill was under consideration stated—at least, one man did—that only from 10 to 15 per cent of the enlisted men would take advantage of the optional insurance plan, and Actuary Wolfe said that not over 25 per cent would take advantage of the optional insurance plan, and that the insurance taken by each man would approximate $2,500. Within a few months we will have in the neighborhood of 2,000,000 men in the Army and Navy. If only 25 per cent of those men take advantage of the optional insurance plan, we will have 1,500,000 men who will not have taken advantage of the plan, and it will mean, gentlemen, that the Sixty-seventh Congress or the Sixty-eighth Congress will be flooded with special pension bills.

If this article means anything, it means that we propose to forestall service-pension legislation by the giving of this insurance. If we are giving to the men $50 on each $1,000 worth of insurance, can not this great Government give the additional $7.50 and thereby protect these 1,500,000 men and their dependents, coming from every walk of life, many of whom are unacquainted with business principles and many of whom will have aged parents and wives and children looking to them and to this Government for assistance? I claim it is our duty here as Members of this Congress to see to it, carrying out this spirit of guardianship, that these men are taken care of and that this insurance shall be given to the men ipso facto of their entrance into the service without the payment of any premium during the period of their service. Assuming that each man takes $5,000, one-half the amount authorized as a maximum, and assuming that each man pays $40 per year for that insurance, having 2,000,000 men, you have $80,000,000 in premiums; but if you take Capt. Wolfe's figures you have 500,000 men, and you have $20,000,000 in premiums; and you have to offset that by the possible pension claims of 1,500,000 men upon the one side and a premium income of $20,000,000 upon the other. Which will we choose? This is our day and this is our hour, and the responsibility is ours. The Government owes a great deal to the soldiers and sailors and their dependents. The children of a disabled or deceased enlisted man must have the assurance that the country for which the breadwinner is disabled or loses his life will secure for them surroundings to which they were accustomed and also provide advantages for education which would be theirs had the soldier not been disabled or had not lost his life. It must not come to pass that a man who offers his services for the United States subjects his family and dependents to the risks of poverty or pinched circumstances by this action.

In connection therewith, I might repeat what I stated a few days ago that under the plan as at present drawn "the men least requiring insurance protection would be the ones most likely to apply for it." We must arrange it so that the dependents of every soldier are safeguarded, and this can not be done more equitably than by providing insurance gratis in equal amounts to every enlisted man.

Nearly three weeks ago I offered the suggestion to some members of the committee in charge of the pending bill that if the Government was to provide insurance for the men and women entering the service, it be given without payment of premiums during the period of the war and in equal amounts.

During debate on this bill in the past week, I have advocated that such a plan be adopted, and I advocate it now.

In response to the argument advanced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that at the close of the war these men would not be provided for under the amendment which we are considering, I shall read it and you will see that this is not so:

SEC. 400. That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female), and to the Navy Nurse Corps (female), when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department, greater protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in Article III, the United States during war, without any charge and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against death or total disability of every person in the sum of $5,000.

Such insurance shall terminate 120 days after the war during which it is granted, or if the insured shall have been discharged or shall resign from the service prior to that time it shall terminate 120 days after such discharge or resignation: Provided, however, That a dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge from the service shall immediately terminate such insurance: And provided further, That such termination shall not affect the liability of the United States to pay for death or total disability occurring prior to such termination.

The United States, prior to the termination of such insurance as herein provided, upon the application of the insured to the bureau, and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against death or total disability of any such person in any multiple of $500 and not less than $1,000 or more than $5,000, in such form or forms of insurance and with such provisions for premium payments as may be provided by regulation.

SEC. 401. Any person in active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who, while in such service and before the passage of this act, has become totally disabled or has died shall be deemed to have been granted insurance in the sum of $5,000, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die before he shall have secured 240 of such installments, the balance of such 240 monthly installments shall be paid, but only if and while there survive him a wife, child, or widowed mother, and in that event the amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between them as may be provided by regulations.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, of course, all of us at all times are very much delighted to hear speeches which sound in patriotism and which are laudatory of the soldiers who go to the front, and it is very popular to declaim from the pit of this House and from the seats that we occupy everything that sounds in laudation of their cause. But sometimes we become too extravagant, and because we are looking for applause at home and perhaps for congratulation here, or semiapplause from the galleries, we overshoot the mark. It seems to me that on this proposition the gentlemen who have favored this amendment, although they may not have been talking to the galleries purposely and may not have desired applause, have truly overshoot the mark.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that the gentleman stands on a higher plane morally than the rest of us who are offering these amendments? If so, I wish the gentleman would get a certificate to that effect.

Mr. DEWALT. I stand on the plane where I propose to do the right thing at the right time, without regard to applause. [Applause.]

Now, what is the concrete proposition as proposed by the gentleman from Missouri? He proposes to give insurance to every soldier and sailor and every male and female nurse, in a concrete sum, without any payment of premium at all by either him or her.

Now, that sounds very good in itself, and I do not doubt that it will meet with the approval of a great many people when they read his speech. But how is it as a matter of fact? When his whole amendment is taken into consideration he concludes the insurance 120 days after the termination of the war, or 120 days after the man has been discharged or resigned from the service. This bill provides that he shall have that insurance continually.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. No; I have only a short time.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman is making a misstatement.

Mr. DEWALT. The bill further provides that the sailor or soldier or nurse shall have an insurance of $8 per month. In other words, for $10,000 insurance he pays $80, and for $5,000 he pays $40, or about $3.33 a month. The bill provides the insurance shall terminate at the end of the war only, or by resignation or discharge, and he may continue it how? By applying to an insurance company or to the United States Government, or get it at a flat rate. What is a flat rate? According to the actuary's statement it will be $15 a year. Or, if on account of increased age he desires to keep on the insurance he can pay the rate according to his age, if he does not take the flat rate. Where is there a better proposition?

Now, my friends, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] proposes something else. He says give each man, sailor or soldier, or male or female nurse, $3,000. What is his plea? His plea is that he wants to provide for the improvident. There are some men who are provident and other men who are not provident, and he proposes to take care by legislation of the improvident.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And also those who are dependent, making it impossible for them to save the amount to pay for the insurance. In the case where a man leaves no widow—

Mr. DEWALT. I am willing to be interrupted for a question but not for a speech.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DEWALT. My reply is that you can legislate to punish men for doing evil, but you can not legislate to make them do good. In other words, you can not make men good by legislation, but you can punish them for doing wrong. If men are improvident, give them some reason why they should be provident. Hold out the hope for them that if they are provident they will get insurance for $8 a year, and then you give them a stimulation for saving money instead of squandering it. I never saw a man, no matter how improvident he might be, who did not appreciate a good bargain when you presented it to him. If you appeal to those men who go to war, that the best thing to do is to be provident and hold out the stimulating hope that they can get something in the shape of a bargain for insurance so that their families can get something in case of death or disability, they will appreciate it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired on this section and all amendments thereto, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to present an amendment to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine can present his amendment.

Mr. HERSEY. And I also ask for five minutes on it.

Mr. SABATH. I call for the regular order.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment again reported.

Mr. BARKLEY. I object.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now arises on the substitute presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DEMPSEY) there were 34 ayes and 78 noes.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 28, lines 3, 4, and 5, strike out all after the word "person," in line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in the sum of $3,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the section reported as it would read if amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to have the section read as it would read if amended.

Mr. BARKLEY. I object.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not see any reason why the gentleman should object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by way of substitute by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that before the question is put the section be read as it will read when amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the section be read as it will read if amended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 400. That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department greater protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in Article III, the United States, upon application to the bureau and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against the death or total disability of any such person in the sum of $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment by way of substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were 54 ayes and 96 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. IGOE) there were—ayes 46, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HERSEY: Page 27, line 19, strike out section 400.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been concluded upon the section and all amendments thereto by order of the committee.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I object, and I give notice now that I am going to move to close debate on every section, and I ask the gentlemen to stay with us, because we are going to put it through to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. AUSTIN offers the following amendment: At the end of line 5, page 28, add the following: "Provided further, That the United States shall furnish free such insurance to all soldiers or sailors who have dependents."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. AUSTIN) there were—ayes 10, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIEGEL: Page 27, line 20, after the word "officer," insert the words "and every Army field clerk."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SIEGEL) there were—ayes 15, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 401. That such insurance must be applied for within 120 days after enlistment or after entrance into or employment in the active service and before discharge or resignation, except that those persons who are in the active war service at the time of the publication of the terms and conditions of such contract of insurance may apply at any time within 120 days thereafter and while in such service. Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who, while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after such publication, becomes or has become totally disabled or dies, or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die before he shall have secured 240 of such installments, the balance of such 240 monthly installments shall be paid, but only if and while there survive him a wife, child, or widowed mother, and in that event the amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between them as may be provided by regulations.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, lines 21 to 25, strike out the words: "If he shall die before he shall have secured 240 of such installments, the balance of such 240 monthly installments shall be paid, but only if and while there survive him a wife, child, or widowed mother," and insert the following: "If he shall die either before he shall have received any of such monthly installments or before he shall have received 240 of such monthly installments, then $25 per month shall be paid to his wife, child, or widowed mother, if and while they survive him: Provided, however, That not more than 240 of such monthly installments, including those received by such person during his total disability, shall be so paid."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be heard on the amendment. The amendment was prepared in answer to the inquiry made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to clear up that language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there has been some debate under this section, and I move that all debate close in five minutes on this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend by moving that debate close in 15 minutes.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to amend by making it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate end in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division. If they are going to put the gag on here, they can have all they want.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman can not say we are putting a gag on after six days' talk.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 84.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands tellers.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman may filibuster if he wants to, but we are going to stay here until we finish.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can stay here and get all the filibustering he wants.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable. Twenty-two gentlemen have arisen, a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. MADDEN] reported—ayes 50, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate will close in five minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS: Page 28, line 6, after the figures "401," strike out down to and including "service," in line 13, and insert: "That all persons eligible, or who may hereafter become eligible, to insurance under the provisions of this act shall upon such eligibility automatically become insured under the provisions of this act, and all premiums for such insurance shall be charged against the salary account of the insured."

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FIELDS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I understand that the debate is closed, although I would like to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 6, strike out lines 6 to 13, down to the word "service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have permission to ask the chairman a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman do it under the next section.

Mr. BATHRICK. That will be too late.

The CHAIRMAN. After the committee has closed its debate by vote it is asking too much to request that it be set aside by unanimous consent. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 402. That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall promptly determine upon and publish the full and exact terms and conditions of such contract of insurance. The insurance shall not be assignable, and shall not be subject to the claims of creditors of the insured or of the beneficiary. It shall be payable only to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister of them, and to such other persons as may be provided from time to time by regulations. The insurance shall be payable only in installments during the life of the insured or beneficiaries, or both, for cash, loan, paid-up and extended values, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable, may be provided for in the contract of insurance. Rights and privileges not provided for may be granted from time to time as may be prescribed by regulations. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries of such insurance without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein or as in the regulations provided.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 30, by striking out all after the word "insurance," in line 20, all of line 21, and the word "regulations" at the beginning of line 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 30, at the end of section 402, add the following: "If no beneficiary within the permitted class be designated by the insured, either in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, or if the designated beneficiary does not survive the insured the insurance shall be payable to such person or persons within the permitted class of beneficiaries as would under the laws of the State of the residence of the insured be entitled to his personal property in case of intestacy. If no such person survive the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the reserve value of the insurance at the time of his death, calculated on the basis of the American Experience Table of Mortality, and 3½ per cent interest, in full of all obligations under the policy."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was spoken of the other day in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and was read into the Record. It simply provides that where the man has no beneficiary living in this permitted class at the time of the death of the insured, whatever the accumulated insurance may be, it shall go to the estate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, before a vote is taken on that amendment I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BATHRICK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to ask the Chairman a question?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes. In line 13, page 28, and on down, ending with line 21, on the same page, that part of this section is to the effect that in the event a person has not applied for insurance before 120 days after April 6 and is disabled or dies he will receive not only the compensation given to him in previous sections of the bill, but also $25 a month. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that is discriminatory?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir. I do not think gentlemen here think anything is discriminatory—some of them. We have done the best we could, and we have made reasonable regulations, and I hope we will go on and pass the bill without delay.

Mr. BATHRICK. There has been no opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; we have had seven days of discussion here, and nearly everybody admits that he knew more about it than the committee all the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BATHRICK. Then we are acting like a lot of schoolboys here. [Laughter.] We are more like a crowd of millmen listening for the whistle to blow. When this House gets to the end of a bill, it arrives at the "no" stage and no one has a chance to amend or correct the bill. The chairman pulls the gad and we have a runaway. I am for the bill, but this should be changed.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, it has afforded me pleasure to be present during the discussion of this great measure, which is intended to take liberal care of the brave men and women who are risking their lives, their all if need be, in protecting and fighting for our flag, the Stars and Stripes, and all the flag stands for in this great warfare for the freedom of all the peoples of all the nations of the world.

This or any other Congress can enact into law no measure that will fully compensate the brave men and women who are offering their services and lives in defense of the principles of this great Republic, but this Congress can do this: It can enact into law a measure that will be helpful to the gallant and brave men and women who are now or soon will be on a foreign shore engaged in the awful strife that the world is engaged in.

I am sincerely interested in assisting to make this measure the best law for the protection of the men who are or will be on the field of action and to their dependents, for we as a people can never do too much for the brave men and women who are risking their all for our Nation.

We owe our appreciation and thanks to the committee in charge of the war-risk bill for the able manner in preparing and presenting the measure, for the courteous manner that the Members in charge of the bill have answered Members who have continuously inquired into the probable administration of the bill when it becomes a law, and who have so generously accepted any amendment that Members have offered that would make the law more helpful to the soldier, the sailor, and their dependents.

I have always since I have had the opportunity as a Member of Congress, by my voice and vote, favored a most liberal allowance or pension for the soldier and sailor who have fought for our country, and for their dependents.

It afforded me pleasure to vote for the Sherwood dollar-a-day pension, and I regret that the Sherwood law as introduced by the brave and gallant soldier, Gen. SHERWOOD, was not agreed to by the other body of this Congress; but the measure as it finally became a law has been very helpful in making the latter days of the brave veterans of former wars more comfortable.

I was glad to support and vote for the bill of September 8, 1916, that allowed the widows of veterans, when arriving at the age of 70, an increase of pension from $12 to $20 a month.

It gave me pleasure to support and vote for a pension for the widows of Spanish and Philippine War veterans, and I hope the day is not far distant when such a law shall be placed in the statutes.

I have a clear and distinct recollection of the Civil War. I remember when the brave boys enlisted, and I saw some of them return to peaceful occupations. No braver men ever offered their lives that the Union might be preserved, and it can be truly said that the men they faced in battle array were as brave soldiers as the world has ever known; and to-day these men, now old, both from the blue and the gray, are united in one common cause for the liberty of the nations, for the upholding of the flag that we all so dearly love and are willing to sacrifice our all for.

I shall never forget an incident that took place on the floor of the House when one day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

RODENBERG] had made an eloquent address to the memory of Lincoln, on the conclusion of which the Members congratulated him, and among those so doing there came Gen. SHERWOOD and Maj. STEDMAN, as brave soldiers as ever drew a sword, one from Ohio and the other from North Carolina, and congratulated the Member from Illinois on his eloquent message. I knew then that the blue and the gray were forever united in the defense of our country.

I am not so particular which bureau shall administer this measure. I want the law administered fairly and justly to all.

I believe that the Pension Bureau, with all its equipments and organization, would be better prepared to administer the law. The present pensioners will decrease in numbers, and for the present all the additional force needed would be clerks, stenographers and typewriters, and the additional stationery, all of which could be appropriated for; but this is no time to quibble what department shall have charge. So much for that.

Article I, providing for maintenance and organization and description of those entitled to benefits, shows the care and study of the committee in preparing the bill for enactment into law and seems to cover all the requirements as to administration.

Article II. I am glad to support Article II, which states specifically what the dependents shall be allowed. During the Civil War dependents on both sides had to depend on their communities, their State units, and their neighbors for sustenance.

The local townships and counties provided as best they could for dependent families, but the system was not complete, and had it not been for kind-hearted neighbors many a mother, wife, and child would have never had any assistance; but this article under its provisions makes a uniform system by which all dependents may be assisted while their loved ones are in the service.

Article III provides for compensation for death and disability. I am sincerely in favor of this portion of the measure. There are some items of compensation that I believe should be increased, for the present pension law in certain cases of injuries, such as the loss of both eyes, both arms, or legs, is more liberal for single men than the measure provides for, and I am glad it has been amended so those soldiers afflicted will receive the same sum as now provided by law. I had said during the debate I am in favor of more liberal compensation for injuries.

Article IV.—Insurance. This is also of utmost importance. I believe that every soldier who goes into service, especially in foreign service, should be required to take out insurance; certainly if he has dependents. If the soldier should lose his life in line of duty, it will not be easily explained to a dependent—mother, a wife—why they do not get the insurance which others receive, because soldiers who had the forethought to insure themselves for the benefit of their dependents at home had taken advantage of this provision of this law.

In conclusion I wish to say I am heartily and sincerely in favor of this measure. It may not be perfect in all details, but when once enacted into law, if not perfect, experience in administration will cause amendments to be offered and passed by future Congresses to remedy any defects. But the committee in charge has done wonderfully well in preparing the measure and it shall have my hearty support.

The people of America will approve our action. We have been very generous toward our allies, and as a people we should appropriate fully the amounts necessary to make the lives of our crippled soldiers and their dependents as comfortable as the broadest humanity will dictate.

The American heart and mind can always be depended upon in the cause of liberty of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in a word, that I am in favor of this bill, and I am anxious to vote for it. I will not take up the time now to make a speech, but I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to any further requests at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 403. That the United States shall bear the expenses of administration and the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazards of war. The premium rates shall be the net rates based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PLATT: On page 30, line 5, after the word "war," strike out the rest of line 5 and all of lines 6, 7, and 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The premium rate shall be $1 per month for each $1,000 of insurance."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment of mine strikes out the words "that the premium shall be based on the American Experience Table of Mortality," and simplifies the provision by making the rate $1 a month. Every soldier will understand it. It will be perfectly easy, as every insurance man will say, to go to the soldier and say that every month he shall contribute $1. You will get twice as many men to take it. It will not be based on age, and this arrangement will make it possible that every man, regardless of his age, will be able to understand it instantly. This will greatly simplify the bill and, in my judgment, it will make it more successful.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 31, at the end of line 5, strike out the period and add the following:

"Provided further, That no other compensation or fee shall be charged or received by any person, except such as may be authorized by the commissioner, in regulations to be promulgated by him. Any person violating this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman, by authority of the committee I offer the following amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent to recur to the section.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. COADY. I understand unanimous consent was granted the other day that we might return to this. It is to include field clerks, that is all.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The right to object will be reserved.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, let the amendment be first reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 4, after the word "officer," where it first appears in said line, add the following: "an Army field clerk, and a field clerk, Quartermaster Corps."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, on page 8, line 17, in the same section that has just been amended, which is a committee amendment. After the word "and" insert "one, and in section 400 and."

That is necessary in order to perfect the wording.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ESCH: On page 8, line 17, after the word "and," where it first occurs in the line, insert the words "one, and in section 400 and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 304, page 22.

Mr. ADAMSON. We gave consent to recur to that when we were reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MADDEN: Page 22, line 9, after the word "computed," strike out the words "in whole or in part" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to the extent of not more than 10 per cent," and on line 22 strike out the word "or," and on line 24 strike out the colon and insert a period, and also strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 30, noes 72.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, by consent we passed over paragraph (d), on page 15. I move to strike out the letter "(d)."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAYBURN: Page 15, line 15, strike out "(d)," at the beginning of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that a moment? I believe there were some other paragraphs passed over that have not been covered.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think we have recurred to all of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We have not. There were certain paragraphs passed over without prejudice, to be returned to, which have not been returned to.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is one more.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Texas thinks there is one more.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia withhold his motion?

Mr. ADAMSON. I withhold the motion.

Mr. RAYBURN. On page 6, the gentleman from Wisconsin raised a point about a part of this being under the directors of these sections and the rest under the commissioner of military and naval insurance.

Mr. ESCH. I raised the point.

Mr. RAYBURN. The reason it was not all put under the director was that this proposition of family allowance is a technical routine matter, in finding the dependents of these people.

Mr. ESCH. It is of immediate necessity.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is of immediate necessity, and it was thought that the director would be so busy with other matters in connection with this bill that this ought to be taken off his hands.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct attention also to the paragraph on the top of page 7, which reads:

Such sum, including all premium payments, is hereby permanently appropriated—

And so forth. That was passed over on the gentleman's request.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, that is true. We also passed the last paragraph in section 20, on page 7.

I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the words "permanently appropriated" and insert the words "made available."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 2, strike out the words "permanently appropriated" and insert the words "made available."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the same amendment, in line 11, page 7, to strike out the words "permanently appropriated" and insert the words "made available."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 11, strike out the words "permanently appropriated" and insert the words "made available."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I make the same request.

Mr. SWITZER. I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I object to all these requests.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 6, insert a new section, as follows: "SEC. 406. That no person who is liable to military service under the selective-draft law shall be employed in the bureau."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SIEGEL) there were 73 ayes and 107 noes.

Mr. SIEGEL. I demand tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused.

So the amendment of Mr. SIEGEL was rejected.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, there is one amendment that ought to be adopted on page 25, section 310, where the language is clearly ambiguous, and I ask unanimous consent to return to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 25, line 6, I move to strike out the words "except by the enemy" and insert in line 7, after the word "offense," the words "except when inflicted by the enemy."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 6, strike out the words "except by the enemy," and in line 7, after the word "offense," insert the words "except when inflicted by the enemy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee do rise, report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to its final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. SIMS. I demand a separate vote on the amendment reducing the amount in the bill from $10,000 to $5,000. At the request of the chairman, I will withdraw that request.

Mr. KEATING. I renew the request, because I do not believe the committee knew what it was voting on when it reduced the amount from $10,000 to $5,000.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will submit them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments upon which a separate vote is desired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 4, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000."

Mr. KEATING. The amendment was to strike out $10,000 and insert $5,000.

The SPEAKER. In the bill as it was introduced it was $10,000, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reduced it to $5,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. And we adopted that amendment in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GILLET. The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. KEATING. It was adopted. The chairman wants $10,000.

The SPEAKER. That is what the chairman wants.

Mr. KEATING. The committee inadvertently voted for $5,000.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair wishes to know is whether the $10,000 was voted into the bill by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ADAMSON. No, Mr. Speaker; the Committee of the Whole adopted the committee amendment reducing it to $5,000. I want to defeat that amendment on a roll call and leave it at $10,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 77 and noes 141.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a reading of the engrossed bill. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time has not yet arrived.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, when it has arrived I give notice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] demands the reading of the engrossed bill, and that is impossible at this time. There is no engrossed bill here. The Chair announces that there will be a meeting of Members of the House, not the House but the Members thereof, in this hall at 8 o'clock to-night to hear M. James Franklin Bouillon make a speech. Nobody is permitted to come in except Members.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, because 40 or 50 gentlemen have secured transportation and desire to leave to-night I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 9 o'clock so as to get the engrossed copy. I will make it half past 9.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CLARK of Florida, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, indefinitely, on account of illness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DENTON was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Anderson against Pittman, second session Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until half past 9 o'clock to-night.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia wants to make a request to have a bill printed and sent to conference and then I will make a motion if the Chair will recognize me.

TRADING-WITH-THE-ENEMY BILL.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 4960, entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," is on the Speaker's table, and I request that the same be printed with the Senate amendments numbered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] asks leave to have printed the bill H. R. 4960 with Senate amendments numbered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And that it lie on the Speaker's table, so that copies may be ready for distribution to Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the bond bill. I inadvertently omitted to make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 9.30 to-night.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 45, noes 181.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many gentlemen who say they have made arrangements to leave town to-night and I do not want to be in a position of embarrassing them. [Applause.] I will withdraw my demand for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I withdraw my motion for a recess. [Applause.]

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, was not the motion carried?

The SPEAKER. What did the gentleman from New York say?

Mr. PLATT. Was not the motion for a recess carried?

The SPEAKER. No; it was never put. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. [Cries of "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 319, answered "present" 5, not voting 109, as follows:

YEAS—319.

The name of Mr. WINSLOW was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, when my name was called I voted "yea." I had a pair with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] who was suddenly called out of town. If he were here, he would vote "yea." Therefore, I desire to have my vote stand as announced.

Mr. WOODYARD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BOWERS, was suddenly called home this evening and he desired me to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and to further announce that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that if my colleagues, Mr. HASKELL and Mr. LA GUARDIA, were here they would vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he voted "Yea."

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires, before he announces this vote, to say that our visitor this evening, M. James Franklin Bouillon, will speak in English, and he speaks very good English, too.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] be given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMSON. There were several gentlemen who desired to discuss the bill. There are not many, and I hope the gentleman will not object to unanimous consent that all of them have leave to extend their remarks.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is asking that everybody be given unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to ask the same privilege for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] extending his remarks in the RECORD on the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 14, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray for wisdom and grace that we may seize every opportunity that comes to us for the development of our spiritual life, taking advantage of the regularly recurring opportunities that come in life to pause in the midst of life's confusion and toil and strife to lift our hearts to Thee and seek and implore the Divine guidance and blessing. Look Thou upon us to-day, O God of our fathers. Forgive our sins. Clear before us the vision of the way that Thou wouldst lead us; and give to us Thy spirit that we may follow in that way. Let Thy blessing rest to-day upon the labors of Thy servants in this Senate. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) for improving Willapa Harbor and River, Wash.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. DEWALT, Mr. ESCH, and Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2785) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The following bill of the House of Representatives was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 5723. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

EMBARGO ON COTTON.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a few days ago I had published in the RECORD a telegram relating to the placing of cotton in the food-control bill having the signatures of H. N. Polk and I. N. McCollister. Mr. McCollister has sent me a telegram stating that he did not sign the first telegram. I ask that his telegram be published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The telegram referred to is as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., September 10, 1917.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

I did not authorize anybody to sign my name to any telegram to put cotton in the food-control bill. I am opposed to cotton being placed in the food-control bill, and also do not want any interference with the United States cotton-futures act of 1916. Our committee stands pat on this.

I. N. MCCOLLISTER,
Chairman Marketing and Traffic Committee,
Association of State Farmers' Union Presidents.

PETITION.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the County Clare Association of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the freedom of Ireland and pledging the moral support of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRODUCTION OF GRAINS AND CEREALS.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred Senate Resolution 129, directing the Secretary of the Interior to make an inquiry relative to the use of public land for the production of grains and cereals during the war, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 129) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HUSTING:

A bill (S. 2882) to grant citizenship to certain persons discharged from the military service of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 2883) to amend an act approved March 2, 1899, increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 2884) to provide for the purchase of additional land for the enlargement of the site of the public building at Stamford, Conn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MARTIN:

A bill (S. 2885) for the relief of the estate of Moses M. Bane; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 2886) for the relief of Albert O. Brown; to the Committee on Public Lands.

WORLD LIBERATION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I submit certain data on the subject of world liberation through international government, prepared by George H. Shibley, and in support of Senate joint resolution 94, introduced by me. I desire to have it printed as a Senate document, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for report.

The motion was agreed to.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. FERNALD conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRINT-PAPER PRICES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to submit a statement, as coming from the Joint Committee on Printing, on the subject of a fair and reasonable price for paper. It will take but a few minutes, and I think it is a matter of public importance.

FAIR AND REASONABLE PRICES FOR PAPER.

[Statement by Senator FLETCHER, of Florida, chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing.]

In connection with the President's order fixing the price of news-print paper for the Government and the complaint docketed by the Federal Trade Commission charging 23 of the leading book-paper manufacturers with unfair methods of competition, I desire to submit a statement of the activities of the Joint Committee on Printing, which have been largely instrumental in bringing about the present situation, that bids fair to put an end to the exorbitant prices demanded for paper.

Mr. Carter, the efficient clerk of the joint committee has assembled this material from our files, and I believe it to be of public importance.

The Joint Committee on Printing, which fixes upon standards, awards contracts, and approves open-market purchases of paper for the Government Printing Office, has devoted much of its time for more than one year to a careful consideration of the paper situation, especially as it affects the Government. I am greatly gratified, therefore, as chairman of the joint committee, that its determined resistance to the demands of certain paper interests has been so fully sustained by the action of the President and the findings of the Trade Commission.

By its close supervision over the purchases of paper for the public printing and binding and its refusal to become "panicky" even when others, scared by the false cry of shortage, were urging the purchase of paper at grossly excessive prices and were commending such prices as "eminently fair and reasonable," the committee undoubtedly will save the Government more than one-half million dollars during the contract years from March 1, 1916, to March 1, 1918. But this saving to the Government, considerable as it is, will be small indeed when compared with the far greater benefit that, I believe, will come to the publishers of the country through the joint committee's efforts to have fair and reasonable prices restored in the paper market.

Of the broad interest in fixing a just price for news-print paper, I thus advised the President, in my letter informing him that the manufacturers of news print had arbitrarily undertaken to raise the price after having agreed with the joint committee to furnish news-print paper to the Government at the figure fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission as a fair and reasonable price:

Aside from the substantial interest which the Government itself has in the purchase of news-print paper at a fair and reasonable price, the publishers of the country, as undoubtedly you are aware, are vitally concerned over the excessive prices they have had to pay for news print during the past year. The Federal Trade Commission, as you know, has made every effort to relieve this situation as it affects the publishers, but, not having the authority to enforce its findings as to price, has been unable to obtain any material relief from them as yet. I am inclined to believe that if the Government could compel the furnishing of news-print paper, even if only for its own use, at a fair and reasonable price, as has been obtained by this committee during the past three months, it would have a powerful influence in securing, without making additional legislation necessary, such a price for the American publishers, many of whom are facing financial ruin owing to the exorbitant prices that have been demanded for news-print paper.

Though the investigation of the book-paper industry, independent of its news-print inquiry, was undertaken by the Federal Trade Commission primarily for the information of the Joint Committee on Printing, pursuant to a resolution offered by me which the Senate adopted on September 7, 1917, the findings of the Trade Commission in regard to book-paper prices are likewise of vital concern to every user of book paper, which includes not only the large publishing houses engaged in the printing of schoolbooks, law books, and reports, and the vast output of popular fiction, but also affects the publishers of magazines and substantially all the agricultural, labor, educational, fraternal, and religious press, which, together with many weekly newspapers, use the better grades of paper, such as machine finished and supercalendered instead of news print. In fact, since this investigation was undertaken at the instigation of the joint committee the prices for paper have "softened" materially. For instance, machine-finish printing paper, for which 11 cents was demanded just prior to the action of the Senate in directing an investigation, can now be purchased for half that price; and if the Trade Commission can sustain its complaint of unfair competition there is good reason to believe that the price will further decrease to near the normal range of between 3 and 4 cents per pound.

With these preliminary observations as to the interest that the Joint Committee on Printing has taken in the paper situation, I present some detailed information as to the committee's work, which, by statutory enactment, relates largely to administrative matters connected with the Government Printing Office, over which Congress has always exercised more or less direct control, through the joint committee, ever since the days the printed records were substituted for the manuscript records of Congress that formerly had to be written by clerks employed for such purpose by the Senate and the House.

First, let me speak of the news-print-paper situation, not that it is of primary importance to the Government itself as a purchaser but owing to the vast interest that the public press has in the fixing of a just price for such material. News-print paper was not carried on the regular schedule of the Government Printing Office until five years ago, when the joint committee decided that it would be advantageous and economical to print certain governmental publications on paper of cheaper quality. Up to the beginning of the contract year 1916-17 the Government had paid around 2½ to 2¾ cents for standard news print, of which it buys small quantities as compared with the amount required by metropolitan newspapers. When proposals were invited for the contract year 1916-17 the lowest bid received on standard news print was 3 cents per pound, and the quantity limited to a six-months' supply. This did not appear especially excessive in view of the war conditions and the fact that the Trade Commission had not then undertaken its investigation of the news-print-paper industry. Accordingly a contract was awarded for furnishing news-print paper to the Government Printing Office at 3 cents per pound, the contractor being required to furnish such quantity as may be needed during the period of the contract from March 1 to September 1, 1916. The estimated quantity was stated at 300,000 pounds.

However, the contractor, the Republic Bag & Paper Co., of New York City, refused to furnish all the news-print paper needed during the six months' period and the Public Printer was forced to buy additional quantities of news-print paper during the remainder of the contract period at 5.9 cents per pound. Consequently the committee insisted that the defaulting contractor should be sued under his contract, and action has now been brought in the United States District Court in New York to recover $11,792.32 from the Republic Bag & Paper Co. on account of the increased price which the Government had to pay for the news-print paper bought in the open market during the term of its contract. The action of the committee in urging that suit be brought against the Republic Bag & Paper Co. was based upon an opinion rendered by the Attorney General on June 13, 1916, in which he held that—

The contract in question was within the power of the Joint Committee on Printing and obligated the contractor to furnish the paper described to the limit of the Government's needs during the life of the contract.

Meanwhile the manufacturers of news print kept boosting the price higher and higher, and when the joint committee opened proposals on February 17, 1917, for the contract year 1917-18, only two bids were found on news print, the lowest being 7½ cents for paper which formerly cost the Government around 2½ cents per pound. The committee promptly rejected this bid as grossly excessive, and this action was soon after sustained by the finding of the Federal Trade Commission, which reported on March 3, 1917, that 2½ cents per pound f. o. b. mill was a fair and reasonable price for standard news print.

The Government Printing Office did not have any need to buy news print paper until May 3, 1917, when the Public Printer advised the committee that the President had authorized the publication of a daily national bulletin, requiring from one to three cars of news print per week. The Public Printer requested authority to purchase one car of news print of the International Paper Co. at 3.1 cents per pound, according to an arrangement which he had made with the president of that company, and also asked further authority to purchase an additional 400,000 pounds "at the lowest available price obtainable." Replying to the Public Printer, I wrote him that I did not feel justified in giving an unconditional approval of his request, in view of the finding of the Federal Trade Commission, and suggested that he invite new proposals on news print, fixing as a maximum price 2½ cents per pound f. o. b. mill, which the Federal Trade Commission had held to be a fair and reasonable price. The Public Printer, acting upon my suggestion, invited proposals on 400,000 pounds of news print from 33 concerns, received only three quotations, all from jobbers, the lowest being 4 cents per pound. In view of this result, the Public Printer recommended that the restrictions which I had imposed as to price be removed "until such time as the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission has been completed and remedial legislation enacted."

I was reluctant, however, to give up the effort to obtain news print at a fair and reasonable price until every means at my command had been exhausted, and I therefore appealed direct to the president of the International Paper Co., advising him that the paper was required as a military supply for the publication of the Official War Bulletin issued under the direction of the President and inviting his attention to section 120 of the national-defense act, which authorizes the President to purchase or procure military supplies in time of actual or imminent war at a reasonable price as determined by the Secretary of War. I then put the question squarely to the president of the International Co. as to whether he would furnish the paper required by the Public Printer for this purpose at a fair and reasonable price as fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission and requested an immediate response. This message was sent to the president of the International Paper Co., of New York City, on May 11, 1917, and, so far as I know, appears to be the first time that the national-defense act was invoked to procure supplies for the Government at a reasonable price.

The president of the International Paper Co. replied by wire on the same day that "in view of the military situation we will manage to secure and will gladly supply the Public Printer with the emergency news-print paper in quantity named in your telegram for the time being at 2½ cents per pound." Believing that this action by the head of the International Paper Co. settled the price of news print for the Government during the war emergency, I thanked him for his generous and patriotic offer, and accordingly authorized the Public Printer to purchase news print as needed at not to exceed 2½ cents per pound, the price fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission. Consequently, I was much surprised to be advised by the Public Printer on August 11 that the International Paper Co. had undertaken to increase the price on an additional order for news print from 2½ to 3 cents per pound. I at once requested the Federal Trade Commission to advise the committee as to whether the proposed increase was justified, especially in view of the fact that the report of the International Paper Co. for 1916 shows net earnings for that year of $3,836,492, and a net treasury surplus of $16,238,743.

The Federal Trade Commission replied, under date of August 15, that in its opinion the increase proposed by the International Paper Co. was not justified, nor is the proposed price of 3 cents per pound a fair and reasonable one for news print. The Trade Commission's reply further stated that, even allowing for certain minor increases in the cost of manufacturing news print since its first finding of 2½ cents as a fair and reasonable price, "the commission's accountants are still of the opinion that the price of 2½ cents gives the International Paper Co. a fair, reasonable, average margin of about $5 per ton, or over 10 per cent, or approximately the same profit per ton at which its sales were made prior to the recent period of increased cost and demand."

Upon receipt of this advice from the Federal Trade Commission, I decided to submit the matter to the President on behalf of the Joint Committee on Printing for his determination as to whether to exercise the authority vested in him by either the national defense act or the food-and-fuel-control act to procure news-print paper required for the printing of the Official Bulletin as a necessary war supply.

I submit herewith, and ask leave to have printed as a part of my remarks, the letter which I addressed to the President under date of August 22, 1917, and the accompanying appendices covering the correspondence with the Public Printer, the International Paper Co., and the Federal Trade Commission relating to the fixing of a price on news-print paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
August 22, 1917.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Manufacturers of news-print paper having declined to continue furnishing paper to the Government at the price fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission as fair and reasonable, I feel it to be my duty to submit the matter to you for determination as to whether the Government should now avail itself of the authority vested in the President by either section 120 of the national-defense act, approved June 3, 1916, or sections 10 and 12 of the food and fuel control act, approved August 10, 1917, to procure such paper as a necessary war supply.

News-print paper is required by the Public Printer for printing the Official Bulletin, and I have been advised that the expenses of this publication, issued by the Committee on Public Information under the order of the President, are paid out of the appropriation "for the national security and defense" in the deficiency act approved April 17, 1917. Paragraph 11 of Bulletin No. 29, issued by the War Department on May 17, 1917, states that the Official Bulletin is issued "for the purpose of disseminating official news during the present war," and that "commanding officers of military posts and stations will post copies of the Official Bulletin in conspicuous places for the information of all concerned." The first issue of the Official Bulletin, on May 10, 1917, page 2, also contains a similar statement signed by the Secretary of the Navy, under the heading "Order to Navy Men," which directs all commandants and commanding officers to have the Official Bulletin "placed in a conspicuous and accessible place and to notify the officers and men under their command of its existence and purpose."

It seems clear to me, therefore, that the Official Bulletin is devoted to "a public use connected with the common defense," and that consequently paper, which is a supply necessary for the publication of the Official Bulletin, comes within the provisions of the national-defense act or the food and fuel control act, to which I have already referred.

For your information in determining whether to direct the purchase of such paper as a war supply, I respectfully submit herewith copies of communications which, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, I have had with the Public Printer, the International Paper Co. of New York, and the Federal Trade Commission, in regard to the purchase of news-print paper for the printing of the Official Bulletin.

In this connection, permit me to explain that the Joint Committee on Printing is vested by the printing act approved January 12, 1895 (28 Stat., 601), with numerous duties relating to the purchase of paper and other supplies required for the public printing and binding, including the annual award of contracts and the authorizing of open-market purchases. When the bids for annual contracts were submitted to the joint committee on February 17, 1917, the prices quoted seemed so excessive and unreasonable that the committee decided that most of the paper on its schedule, including news print, should be bought in the open market until such time as conditions might warrant the entering into contracts. The open-market purchases of all classes of paper since March 1, the beginning of the paper year, indicate a saving of considerably more than $350,000 for the year, as compared with the bids for annual contracts, and fully justify the action of the committee in rejecting the proposals for annual contracts. The lowest bid submitted February 17 for news-print paper on annual contract was 7.25 cents per pound, there being only two bidders, both jobbers, though proposals had been formally requested from all the paper manufacturers and dealers. The action of the committee in rejecting these proposals has also been sustained by the subsequent reports of the Federal Trade Commission on its investigation of news-print and book-paper prices, as contained in Senate Documents Nos. 3, 45, and 49, Sixty-fifth Congress.

When the Public Printer was advised that the publication of an Official Bulletin was contemplated, requiring from one to three cars of news-print paper per week, he obtained a quotation of 3.1 cents per pound f. o. b. mill, from the International Paper Co. for one car lot, and asked the committee on May 3, 1917 (see Appendix A), for authority to purchase this quantity and an additional 400,000 pounds "at the lowest available price," which, evidently, would not be less than 3.1 cents per pound.

To this request of the Public Printer I replied on May 4, 1917 (see Appendix B) calling his attention to the fact that the Federal Trade Commission had found 2.5 cents per pound f. o. b. mill to be a "fair and reasonable price" for standard news-print paper. This price was fixed upon by the Trade Commission in response to a formal request signed by the principal news-print manufacturers, including the International Paper Co., "to find, fix, and determine forthwith what price per 100 pounds at the mill would be a fair and reasonable price for the sale of such paper for use in the United States during the period of time from March 1, 1917, to September 1, 1917," and agreeing to "carry out and complete at the price fixed upon by the Trade Commission all existing contracts for the sale of such paper," and further agreeing "to cooperate with the Federal Trade Commission in carrying out any plan approved by the commission to bring about the distribution of news-print paper for the purpose of securing prompt and effective relief to the small publishers of the United States and which will enable such small publishers, through cooperative buying, to secure their news-print paper at practically the same price as that which is hereinafter to be enjoyed by the larger publishers," with the added provision that "new publishers shall not be charged more than said maximum price so found, fixed, and determined by the Federal Trade Commission during said period of time." This agreement, however, so far as it affects the publishers, was never carried out by the news-print paper manufacturers. (See News-print Paper Report, S. Doc. No. 49, 65th Cong., pp. 136-7.)

On account of the findings of the Federal Trade Commission I advised the Public Printer that I did not feel justified in giving an unconditional approval of his request and suggested that he invite competitive proposals for furnishing news-print paper, setting as a maximum price 2½ cents per pound f. o. b. mill, as fixed upon by the Trade Commission. I further advised the Public Printer that I did not believe it would be good policy for the Government Printing Office to purchase news-print paper at a price in excess of that which the Trade Commission declared to be a fair and reasonable one, and stated that if the manufacturers were not patriotic enough to furnish paper at such a price I believed the Government would be fully warranted in taking the necessary steps to purchase or procure such paper as provided for under the provisions of section 120 of the national-defense act.

Complying with my suggestion, the Public Printer issued a request for proposals, under date of May 5, 1917, on 400,000 pounds of news-print paper, stating that the price bid should not exceed 2.5 cents per pound f. o. b. mill, "under a recent ruling of the Joint Committee on Printing, based on the report of the Federal Trade Commission." Bids were invited of 33 concerns, including the International Paper Co., but the Public Printer received only three quotations, all from jobbers, the lowest bid being 4 cents per pound. This result was reported to the committee in the Public Printer's letter under date of May 10, 1917 (see Appendix C) in which he also stated that "it does not seem possible under the conditions above set forth to obtain news-print paper for the important work which we now have in hand at the price of $0.025 per pound f. o. b. mill in car lots. . . . As the restrictions placed by the committee in your letter of May 4, limiting the price for the purchase of news-print paper to $0.025 per pound f. o. b. mill, in carload lots, have not been productive of favorable results, I respectfully recommend that the restrictions be removed until such time as the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission has been completed and remedial legislation enacted whereby a more definite condition will prevail, so that I may be enabled to purchase paper for public printing and binding work without delay, such as is incident to an effort to do something which seems impossible under existing circumstances."

Upon receipt of the foregoing letter from the Public Printer I at once took the matter up by telegram with Mr. Philip T. Dodge, president of the International Paper Co., of New York City, advising him that the paper was "urgently needed for daily publication of Official War Bulletin, issued under direction of the President as Commander in Chief of Army and Navy" and that the committee desired to know the attitude of his company in regard to furnishing such paper at the price fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission before taking steps to procure the paper as a military supply, inviting his attention to section 120 of the national-defense act. Mr. Dodge replied the same day, agreeing to furnish the necessary news-print paper "for the time being" at 2½ cents per pound, stating, however, that this price was "below market price and does not give us a fair profit, but we are anxious to aid the Government as far as possible." The Public Printer was accordingly advised under date of May 12, 1917 (see Appendix D) of the success of this negotiation and authorized to purchase the news-print paper required for the printing of the Official Bulletin of the International Paper Co. at not to exceed 2½ cents per pound.

Pursuant to its agreement, the International Paper Co. has furnished approximately 400,000 pounds of news-print paper at 2½ cents per pound, the price fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission, but on August 11, 1917, (see Appendix E), the Public Printer advised the committee that he had received a letter from Chester W. Lyman, vice president of the International Paper Co., under date of August 9, 1917 (see Appendix F), increasing the price on an additional order for 400,000 pounds of news-print paper for the printing of the Official Bulletin from 2½ to 3 cents per pound, which increase, the vice president of the International Co. stated, was made necessary by the "steadily mounting cost of manufacture."

These letters were forwarded to the Federal Trade Commission by me on August 13, 1917 (see Appendix G), with a request for advice to the committee as to whether the proposed increase was justifiable, and whether the new price of 3 cents per pound was, in the opinion of the commission, a fair and reasonable one. In submitting its reply the Trade Commission was asked to especially consider the fact that the Canadian Government had issued an order in council fixing upon 2½ cents per pound as a fair and reasonable price for the sale of news-print paper in Canada. The attention of the Trade Commission was invited also to the report of the International Paper Co. for 1916 showing its net earnings for that year to have reached the enormous sum of $3,836,492 despite the claim of greatly increased cost of manufacture, and that its net treasury surplus now amounts to $16,238,743. The Trade Commission was further asked to consider a statement filed recently by certain minority stockholders of the International Co., in a suit to compel the distribution of this surplus, to the effect that the officers of the International Co. had joined with the officers of other corporations in an organization known as the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association "for the purpose of suppressing competition." This statement undoubtedly refers to the indictment of Philip T. Dodge, president of the International Paper Co., and six other news-print manufacturers by the Federal grand jury in New York on April 11, 1917, for alleged violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

The Federal Trade Commission in its reply of August 15, 1917 (see Appendix H), answering the specific inquiry as to the proposed increase from 2½ to 3 cents per pound for news-print paper furnished to the Government, states that "the commission is of the opinion that neither is the increase justifiable nor the proposed price a fair and reasonable one." The letter from the Trade Commission concedes that there have been some increases in the cost of manufacturing news-print paper since it first fixed upon 2½ cents as a fair and reasonable price, but adds that "allowing for these several factors, the commission's accountants are still of the opinion that the price of 2½ cents gives the International Paper Co. a fair, reasonable, average margin of about $5 per ton, or over 10 per cent, or approximately the same profit per ton at which its sales were made prior to the recent period of increased cost and demand."

In view of this opinion of the Federal Trade Commission, which has made a most exhaustive and painstaking investigation of the subject as indicated by its reports to the Senate (see Senate Documents Nos. 3 and 49, Sixty-fifth Congress) I am sure the Joint Committee on Printing would not feel justified in authorizing the Public Printer to purchase news-print paper at more than 2½ cents per pound, which has been determined by the Trade Commission to be a fair and reasonable charge. As the manufacturers of news-print paper have refused to furnish additional quantities at this price the only course available to the Government to procure such paper without the payment of excessive profits seems to be in the exercise of the authority vested in the President by the sections of either the national defense act or the food and fuel control act to which I have referred.

Aside from the substantial interest which the Government itself has in the purchase of news-print paper at a fair and reasonable price the publishers of the country, as undoubtedly you are aware, are vitally concerned over the excessive prices they have had to pay for news print during the past year. The Federal Trade Commission, as you know, has made every effort to relieve this situation as it affects the publishers, but not having the authority to enforce its findings as to price has been unable to obtain any material relief for them as yet. I am inclined to believe that if the Government could compel the furnishing of news-print paper, even if only for its own use, at a fair and reasonable price as has been obtained by this committee during the past three months, it would have a powerful influence in securing, without making additional legislation necessary, such a price for the American publishers, many of whom are facing financial ruin owing to the exorbitant prices that have been demanded for news-print paper.

The Public Printer advises me that he now has on hand only about a 10-day supply of news-print paper for continuing the publication of the Official Bulletin.

Respectfully, yours,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER
Chairman.

APPENDIX A.

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, May 3, 1917.

SIR: The issue of a daily national bulletin under the personal direction of the President will require the use of from one to three cars per week of news-print paper in 48-inch rolls, the purchase of which is not provided for under existing contracts. The publication will begin on Monday next, and it is essential that an immediate purchase and shipment of this class of paper be made. I have therefore arranged with the president of the International Paper Co., without competition, as the most available source of supply able to meet the requirement within the short period of time allowed, to furnish immediately one car (approximately 40,000 pounds, with an allowance for a 10 per cent overrun) of 24 by 36 inch, 32 pounds to 500 sheets, of news-print paper at a price of $0.031 per pound f. o. b. mill, and will doubtless be able to arrange with this company for a limited additional supply of the paper needed until satisfactory permanent arrangements can be made for regular weekly shipments from some mill able to meet the requirement at an acceptable price.

In accordance with section 11 of the act of January 12, 1895, relating to the public printing and binding, I respectfully recommend that you authorize and approve the purchase of the 40,000 pounds of news-print paper which I have already instructed the International Paper Co. to make and deliver at a price of $0.031 per pound, and that you further authorize the purchase of an additional 400,000 pounds of the same class and description of paper at the lowest available price obtainable by competition or through negotiations, allowance being made for an overrun of approximately 10 per cent.

Respectfully,

CORNELIUS FORD,
Public Printer.

CHAIRMAN JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

APPENDIX B.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
May 4, 1917.

THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Government Printing Office.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of May 3, 1917, stating that you have arranged with the president of the International Paper Co., without competition, to purchase one car of news-print paper, 24 by 36 inches, 32 pounds, for immediate delivery at a price of 3.1 cents per pound f. o. b. mill, and requesting my approval of such purchase and also authority to purchase an additional 400,000 pounds of the same kind of paper at the lowest available price obtainable by competition or through negotiations.

In this connection I desire to call your attention to the fact that the Federal Trade Commission has found that 2.5 cents per pound f. o. b. mill, car lots, is a "fair and reasonable price for the sale of standard news-print paper in rolls," as set forth in its report on the news-print paper industry submitted to the Senate and printed as Senate document No. 3, Sixty-fifth Congress. This finding of the Trade Commission was made in response to a request of the manufacturers of news-print paper, including the International Paper Co. itself, who signed an agreement to accept whatever price might be fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission as a fair and reasonable one. I understand that the news-print manufacturers have not as yet carried out that agreement, but that negotiations are now being conducted by the Federal Trade Commission with a view to putting its findings into effect in a few days. I have also been advised that in the meantime certain news-print manufacturers are charging publishers the contract or market price for paper and the price fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission will be refunded to such publishers whenever the latter price becomes effective.

In view of this situation I do not feel justified in giving unconditional approval of your request for authority to purchase news-print paper at a price of 3.1 cents per pound f. o. b. mill. However, as the carload already ordered by you appears to be urgently needed for beginning the issue of the Daily National Bulletin, you are authorized to purchase the same at the price agreed upon, provided the contractor agrees to refund to the Government whatever amount the purchase price may subsequently be found to exceed the price that may be put into effect through the Federal Trade Commission.

In regard to the purchasing of an additional 400,000 pounds of news-print paper, I would respectfully suggest that you ask for competitive proposals on the same, fixing as a maximum price 2.5 cents per pound f. o. b. mill, car lots, or whatever price the Federal Trade Commission may subsequently decide is a fair and reasonable one. I am of the opinion that it would not be good policy for the Government Printing Office to purchase news-print paper at a price in excess of that which the Federal Trade Commission has found to be a fair and reasonable one. In requesting such proposals it might be well to state that the paper is desired for the publication of a Daily National Bulletin under the personal direction of the President, as required by the present war emergency. If the news-print paper manufacturers are not patriotic enough to furnish paper at a fair and reasonable price in response to such an appeal, I believe the Government would be fully warranted in taking the necessary steps to purchase or procure the necessary paper, as provided for in section 120 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, which seems to make adequate provision for just such an emergency, particularly in view of the fact that the paper you propose to purchase is required for a publication to be issued under the direction of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Respectfully, yours,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

APPENDIX C.

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, May 10, 1917.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your communication of May 4, 1917, relative to my request for authority to purchase news-print paper for the Daily National Bulletin, which is to be issued under the personal direction of the President, and have carefully noted the views and attitude of the committee regarding the price to be paid for news-print paper, and also the conditional approval of the purchase of the carload of news-print paper from the International Paper Co. at $0.031 per pound f. o. b. mill.

In reply thereto I have to advise that in accordance with the conditions set forth in your letter I have issued specifications covering 400,000 pounds of news-print paper, inviting 33 concerns interested in this class of paper to submit propositions. To date only 9 have responded, and only 3 of the 9 have submitted a price. Those bidding are:

	Per pound.
Birmingham & Seaman Co.	$0.04
Smith, Dixon Co.	.0443
Maurice O'Meara Co.	.046

The Republic Bag & Paper Co. state that they can furnish 400,000 pounds of news-print paper, but not at the price of $2.50 per hundred f. o. b. mill.

The Richmond Paper Manufacturing Co. state that they do not have their own pulp mill and are down and out, as far as the manufacture of news-print paper is concerned.

The Unity Paper Mills advise that they do not make news-print paper and are, therefore, unable to quote on same. This company was listed in the directory as a news-print mill, but have doubtless discontinued the manufacture of that class of paper.

The Cliff Paper Co. advise that our price limit of $0.025 per pound is less than their cost of production at the mill without any overhead. While they would be glad to assist the Government in any way in its requirements, they do not think they should stand a decided loss. They further state that the Federal Trade Commission may have some information as to a body that they as manufacturers do not possess, and that they know what the material costs which goes into the paper and what it costs them to manufacture. They also express the hope that we will be able to obtain the paper at our price.

Finch, Pruyn & Co. advise that they are without a sulphite mill, and, under the necessity of purchasing all of their sulphite, they are unable to furnish paper at $0.025 per pound f. o. b. their mill.

The Hartje Paper Manufacturing Co. advise that they are not in a position "on account of the fact that they are not manufacturing news print at present." They further state that the price of news print was so low a few years ago that they were compelled to discontinue it and take up other grades, principally wrapping.

It does not seem possible under the conditions above set forth to obtain news-print paper for the important work which we now have in hand at the price of $0.025 per pound, f. o. b. mill, in car lots.

I have brought to the attention of the president of the International Paper Co. the conditional approval of the purchase of the carload of news print already delivered at $0.031 per pound, requesting him to submit for the information of this office and the Joint Committee on Printing his views regarding the matter, stating also his attitude relating to the purchase of the car of news-print paper in question, indicating his acceptance or rejection of the conditional approval as stated by the Joint Committee on Printing.

The issue of the Daily National Bulletin is to begin to-day and I, therefore, feel compelled to use the news-print paper delivered by the International Paper Co. at $0.031 per pound, f. o. b. mill, but as the quantity received is estimated to last for a period of approximately 10 days, and as the restrictions placed by the committee in your letter of May 4, limiting the price for the purchase of news-print paper to $0.025 per pound, f. o. b. mill, in carload lots, has not been productive of favorable results, I respectfully recommend that the restrictions be removed until such time as the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission has been completed and remedial legislation enacted whereby a more definite condition will prevail so that I may be enabled to purchase paper for public printing and binding work without delay such as is incident to an effort to do something which seems impossible under existing circumstances.

For your information I am inclosing herewith copy of the specification with a list of the names of concerns to which it was sent.

Respectfully,

CORNELIUS FORD,
Public Printer.

CHAIRMAN JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
United States Senate.

APPENDIX D.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
May 12, 1917.

The PUBLIC PRINTER,
Government Printing Office.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of May 10, 1917, stating the result of your effort to obtain open-market quotations on news-print paper for the printing of the Official Bulletin issued under the direction of the President, and requesting to be relieved of the instructions contained in my letter of May 4 fixing a maximum price of 2½ cents per pound for news-print paper, f. o. b. mill, car lots, as determined upon by the Federal Trade Commission as a fair and reasonable price for such paper.

On yesterday I sent the following telegram to Mr. P. T. Dodge, president of the International Paper Co., 30 Broad Street, New York City:

"Public Printer advises Joint Committee on Printing that your company has failed to respond to his request of May 5 for quotation on news print based on findings of Federal Trade Commission. This paper is urgently needed for daily publication of official war bulletin issued under the direction of the President as Commander in Chief of Army and Navy. The committee desires to know attitude of your company before taking further steps to procure such paper as a military supply, and, in this connection, invites your attention to section 120 of the national-defense act. Will your company furnish news-print paper as Government may need for this publication, which Public Printer estimates will require from one to three cars per week, at a fair and reasonable price, as fixed upon by Federal Trade Commission? An immediate answer is requested."

The following telegram, under date of May 11, was received this morning from Mr. Dodge:

"Your telegram received. The Trade Commission arbitration not applicable to case of Government Printer. Nevertheless, in view of military situation, we will manage to secure and will gladly supply Public Printer with emergency news-print paper in quantity named in your telegram for the time being at 2½ cents per pound. This is below market price and does not give us a fair profit, but we are anxious to aid the Government as far as possible. Much paper is now costing more to make. Our entire news-print paper production is under contract and demands are exceeding our possible production. With difficulty we managed to secure and ship quickly one car of emergency paper ordered by Government Printer. We assume the Government will protect us from any liability to contract customers."

In response to the above telegram I wired Mr. Dodge to-day as follows:

"I desire to thank you for your generous and patriotic offer to furnish news-print paper to the Public Printer at 2½ cents per pound in accordance with my telegram of yesterday. I shall refer your message to the Public Printer for further communication with you in this regard. Of course, the Government can not assume any liability on account of your contracts with other consumers, but it does not seem at all probable, in view of the immense capacity of your mills and the comparatively small quantity of news print required by the Government, that you will have difficulty to fulfill existing contracts and at the same time supply the needs of the Government in the present emergency."

In accordance with these telegrams you are hereby authorized to purchase of the International Paper Co. such quantities of news-print paper as may be needed for the printing of the Official Bulletin, issued under the direction of the President, at a price of not to exceed 2½ cents per pound f. o. b. mill, car lots. As stated in my telegram to Mr. Dodge, the Government can not undertake to assume any liability on account of the other contracts which that company may have, but I do not believe Mr. Dodge will insist on this point in view of the fact that the International Mills have a daily capacity of 1,500 tons, compared with which your probable maximum requirement of 10 tons a day is quite insignificant.

Respectfully, yours,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

APPENDIX E.

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, August 11, 1917.

CHAIRMAN JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am sending you herewith a copy of a letter received from the International Paper Co. relative to furnishing an additional supply of news-print paper in 48-inch rolls for use in printing the Official Bulletin.

The inclosure is in reply to my effort to obtain a quotation from the International Paper Co. for furnishing an additional 400,000 pounds of news-print paper at the price of .025 per pound, f. o. b. mill, the rate at which the previous order was delivered.

As the supply on hand, together with the balance due on the outstanding order will only be sufficient for a period of about 30 days, I respectfully request that you direct the action to be taken in the matter.

Respectfully,

CORNELIUS FORD,
Public Printer.

APPENDIX F.

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
New York, August 9, 1917.

Mr. CORNELIUS FORD,
Public Printer, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 31st ultimo has already been formally acknowledged, and we have also received your letter of August 3, and now write to inclose our formal proposal for supplying the Government with an additional 400,000 pounds of standard news-print paper, the same as already furnished you. You will notice that we have changed the price to 3 cents per pound f. o. b. mill. This step has been taken after considerable reflection and in view of the figures showing cost of producing this paper. Without going into details, suffice it to say that the cost of production substantially exceeds 2½ cents, which the Government is now paying us, and that the price of 3 cents only gives us a very moderate profit. It is $2 lower than we have sold any news print for during this calendar year and at least $10 lower than we could obtain for the paper in the open market. Under the circumstances, therefore, we trust that the price will not only be accepted, but that you will appreciate that we are still desirous of furnishing paper to the Government on the basis of the lowest price at which we could afford to, and at considerable sacrifice. We feel sure that the Government officials do not wish to burden industries by placing orders at prices which do not yield some fair return to the manufacturers. Our cost of manufacture is steadily mounting, and we have already sold considerable news-print paper which has cost us more to make than even this price of 3 cents, and the probabilities are that our costs will go still higher. Since we are confronted with scarcity of labor and supplies, in furnishing paper to the Government we are taking chances on being able to fulfill all of our other contracts.

Yours, very truly,

CHESTER W. LYMAN,
Vice President.

APPENDIX G.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
August 13, 1917.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

SIRS: In connection with your investigation of the increase in prices of paper, as directed by Senate resolution No. 269, Sixty-fourth Congress, I desire to invite your attention to the inclosed letter from the Public Printer under date of August 11 and the accompanying communication from the International Paper Co., of New York, under date of August 9, 1917. You will observe that the International Paper Co. has quoted a price of 3 cents per pound f. o. b. mill for future deliveries to the Government of news-print paper, thereby declining to continue to furnish such paper to the Government at 2½ cents per pound in accordance with the negotiations of which I advised your commission under date of May 19, 1917.

Before acting upon the request of the Public Printer, the committee desires to be advised as to whether the increase is justifiable and whether the proposed price of 3 cents per pound f. o. b. mill is, in the opinion of your commission, a fair and reasonable one.

In this connection I invite your attention to the following statements, of which you are undoubtedly aware, but which I ask you to especially consider in determining whether the price proposed by the International Paper Co. is a fair and reasonable one for the Government to pay:

1. The Canadian Government is reported to have issued an order in council fixing upon $2.50 per 100 as a fair and reasonable price at which news-print paper should be sold in Canada.

2. The International Paper Co. is reported to have had "unprecedented prosperity" during 1916, its balance sheet of December 31, 1916, showing net earnings for the year of $3,836,492. The net surplus of this company is also reported to have increased from $814,908 in November, 1908, to a total net surplus now in its treasury of $16,238,743.

3. In a statement recently filed by certain minority stockholders of the International Paper Co. to compel a distribution of the foregoing surplus it is alleged by those stockholders that the officers of the International Paper Co. joined with the officers of other corporations in an organization known as the News-Print Manufacturers' Association "for the purpose of suppressing competition."

4. The following statement is contained on page 26 of the Editor and Publisher for August 4, 1917:

"Last Saturday John T. Carey, president of the executive council of the International Paper Makers, asserted in a statement made in Albany that there is no scarcity of the supply of news-print paper. According to Mr. Carey many of the news-print mills of the United States are either idle or are working on reduced time."

An early reply will be greatly appreciated, as you will observe from the letter of the Public Printer an order must soon be placed for the additional quantity of news-print paper for use in the printing of the Official Bulletin issued under the direction of the President.

Respectfully,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

APPENDIX H.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 15, 1917.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Joint Committee on Printing,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is in acknowledgment of the 13th, inclosing copy of a letter of August 11 from the Public Printer and a letter of Chester W. Lyman, vice president of the International Paper Co., with reference to a proposed increase in price of news-print paper being furnished in printing Government publications from 2½ to 3 cents, f. o. b. mill.

This letter and inclosures have come to my desk. I am replying after consultation with Commissioner Davies.

Answering your specific inquiry "as to whether the increase is justifiable and whether the proposed price of 3 cents per pound f. o. b. mill, is, in the opinion of the commission, a fair and reasonable one," the commission is of the opinion that neither is the increase justifiable nor the proposed price a fair or reasonable one.

This opinion is based on the fact that under the signatory agreement, of which the International Paper Co. was a member, the price of news print for the period from March 1 to October 1, 1917, was fixed at 2½ cents, provided that no reexamination has been requested. That price, according to the finding of the commission's accountants, allowed a very reasonable margin on the average output of the International. The commission is informed and believes that there have been some increases to the International because of its difficulty in getting out its wood, necessitating to some extent purchase at increased costs. The increased costs, or what are known as the minor items, such as screens, clothing, etc., amount to so little per ton as to be negligible. The commission is also informed that the International has put on in the production of news print certain of its slower wrapping-paper machines in aid of the production situation, thereby, however, increasing its average cost to a small extent. Allowing for these several factors, the commission's accountants are still of the opinion that the price of 2½ cents gives to the International Paper Co. a fair, reasonable, average margin of about $5 per ton, or over 10 per cent, or approximately the same profit per ton at which its sales were made prior to the recent period of increased cost and demand.

Meantime the future as to the paper situation is not bright. About January 1 the majority of publishers must make new contracts. There is every indication that they will be plundered. The bill prepared in your committee at the time Mr. Davies and myself appeared before you is respectfully recalled to your attention.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM B. COLVER,
Commissioner.

Mr. FLETCHER. The injustice of the price demanded for news print seems to have been at once apparent to the President, for he acted with characteristic promptness and energy in response to my communication. The President directed the Secretary of War to place an order with the International Paper Co. for news-print paper required by the Public Printer, fixing as the price which the Government will pay therefor the amount which the Federal Trade Commission had determined to be a fair and reasonable one.

The following is a copy of the telegram which the Secretary of War sent to the International Paper Co. on August 27, directing that news-print paper be furnished the Public Printer at the price of 2½ cents per pound for the printing of the Official Bulletin:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 27, 1917.

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
30 Broad Street, New York City:

Under and pursuant to the authority vested in him by section 120 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, the President hereby directs that you furnish to the Public Printer 400,000 pounds of news-print paper in 48-inch rolls, as per his proposal sheet No. 13194, at a price of 2½ cents per pound, such paper being for the use of the Official Bulletin, published by the Committee on Public Information, created by Executive order dated April 14, 1917. The deliveries upon this order will be made in times, amounts, and places as follows: Two cars per week at the Government Printing Office, first cars in eight days.

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. The price of 2½ cents a pound, as I understand, was found by the Federal Trade Commission to be a reasonable price. Can the Senator from Florida state what profit the International Paper Co. would make on paper which is sold at that price?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Federal Trade Commission found that that price would give them a "fair, reasonable, average margin of about $5 per ton, or over 10 per cent, or approximately the same profit per ton at which its sales were made prior to the recent period of increased cost and demand."

That was the finding of the Federal Trade Commission when we submitted the matter to them for reinvestigation after the first investigation had been made some months ago.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator tell us what are the prevailing prices charged to publishers for news-print paper of the same quality?

Mr. FLETCHER. My understanding is that the price charged to the trade is about 4½ cents a pound. I think the newspapers generally pay about 4½ cents a pound for news-print paper.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, means in quantities less than carloads?

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume that is so. I had in my hand some time ago certain resolutions of an association representing the purchasers, in which the price of 4½ cents per pound was quoted as the price agreed on by that association. Whether it was in carload lots or otherwise, I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. It was in small quantities, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I know of a number of contracts that have been made at $2.50 per hundred and at $2.76 per hundred; and they have been made within the last 60 days.

Mr. POMERENE. And with newspaper publishers?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; with newspaper publishers; that is, the manufacturers of paper are charging the newspaper publishers to-day from $2.50 to $2.76 a hundred by carload lots. Wherever paper is sold in less than carload lots, the price, I think, is as high as, and in some cases higher than, the Senator from Florida has already stated.

Mr. POMERENE. That price is very much lower than the prevailing prices some months ago, if I am rightly informed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that newspapers which were purchasing large quantities of print paper did for a while pay as high as 3 cents a pound for it; those who had contracts at that time were paying at the old contract price of about $2.40 a hundred.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean to say that he has knowledge of several instances of that kind, or is that the price generally to publishers in carload lots?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator I will state that I know the western newspapers are paying the prices which I have just named; and I take it for granted that the eastern newspapers using print paper in large quantities would pay no more than the western papers are paying.

Mr. POMERENE. Then if these prices have been substantially reduced, I hope the Senator will bear in mind that one reason for keeping the prices of second-class postage down has vanished.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is not any doubt but that even $2.50 is higher than print paper has cost the newspaper people in the past. The magazine people, I will say to the Senator, however, use a better paper than the kind of paper we are discussing at this time.

The Senator is referring now to white print paper which is used by the newspapers of the country and not by the magazines.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator, has there been a corresponding decrease in the price of paper which is used by the magazines?

Mr. SMOOT. There has been a large increase upon that class of paper on account of the extreme cost of materials entering into it. The claim made by the publishers is absolutely correct, that they are paying an extremely high price for the paper that they use in their magazines.

Mr. POMERENE. But the Senator has just spoken of the decrease in the price of news-print paper, and I am asking whether there has been a corresponding decrease in the price of paper of the kind used by the magazines?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say as to that, because I have not come in contact with any contracts that have been made, nor have I heard from any of the publishers of magazines as to what they are paying to-day for that class of paper.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, Mr. President, that I do not question what the Senator from Utah has stated in regard to the rates at which the present contracts are being made; but when the joint committee called for bids from 33 concerns for supplying news-print paper, and only received bids from 3, the lowest price then offered being over 4 cents a pound, though we finally got them down to 3 cents a pound, and then, after considerable effort, reached a basis of 2½ cents a pound, after having referred the matter to the Federal Trade Commission to ascertain what would be a fair and reasonable price, and when they protested against the 2½ cents a pound rate I do not see how they can very well take that position and still make contracts at 2½ cents a pound to publishers elsewhere.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that the contracts are being made; I myself have seen the contracts, and I know they are being made at the prices I have named. For instance, take the newspapers of Salt Lake City. The Evening Telegram has contracts now that will run for nearly four years.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if those contracts were made before war conditions arose?

Mr. SMOOT. They were made just a few months ago, and that concern is paying $2.50 a hundred for their paper. I know of two other papers that have made contracts within 30 days, and they are compelled to pay $2.76 by the same paper-making concern that sold paper to the Evening Telegram for $2.50 a hundred. I take it for granted that all the eastern users of print paper—that is, the large newspaper companies—certainly would not pay any more than we are paying in the West.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida how many bids the committee had?

Mr. FLETCHER. We had 3 bids, when we called for bids for news-print paper, out of 33 supposed suppliers.

Mr. POMERENE. Judging from the information I have received from newspaper publishers in Ohio, the Government is, then, four times as fortunate as the publishers are, because as a rule, no matter how many requests may be made for paper from different manufacturers, the newspapers usually get a quotation from just one manufacturer.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there is no doubt about the fact that there has been an effort to prevent competition among these manufacturers. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] suggests aside that perhaps the people on the Pacific coast get a better rate than those on the Atlantic coast. I do not know as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Generally we have to pay a higher rate on the Pacific coast than is paid on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the manager of the San Francisco Daily Post-Call, Mr. Kellogg, informed me that they had no reasonable complaint; that the rates they received were more favorable than the eastern rates. That is the source of my information.

Mr. FLETCHER. At any rate, I think that what the Senator from Utah states but emphasizes the fact that 2½ cents a pound fixed by the Federal Trade Commission would allow a reasonable profit to the manufacturers when carload lots of their product are taken, as is true in the case of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any question about it, although I want to be perfectly fair in the matter, and state that the size of print paper used by the Government is different from the size of the paper generally used by newspapers; and I know that some of the manufacturers have stated that they would not bid on that account; that they did not make the sizes required and that the quantity used by the Government Printing Office for the printing of speeches—and that is about the only purpose for which that kind of paper is used—was so small that it would not justify them in changing their machinery in order to make the sizes required by the Government Printing Office. There is only that excuse; but in stating that I still believe, in fact I know, that 2½ cents a pound is all that ought to be charged for common white print paper, and there is a splendid profit at that price.

Mr. FLETCHER. Now, Mr. President, I will proceed.

P. T. Dodge, president of the International Paper Co., replied to the telegraphic order from the Secretary of War, which I had just read when interrupted, as follows, under date of August 28, 1917:

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
New York, August 28, 1917.

HON. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This company is in receipt of your telegraphic order of yesterday, demanding the shipment of 400,000 pounds of news-print paper to the Government Printing Office, at a price of 2½ cents per pound, under the authority of section 120 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense," etc.

As a matter of loyalty and patriotism, this paper will be furnished to meet the alleged needs of the Government.

Section 120 of the national defense act provides that "the compensation to be paid to any individual, firm, company, etc., for its products or material . . . shall be fair and just."

The price named by you—2½ cents per pound—is an arbitrary, unfair, and unjust price, and does not meet the requirement of the law.

It is not a proper price and is not a price which will give this company a profit.

I assume that your action in fixing this price is based on the finding of the Federal Trade Commission that 2½ cents per pound from March 1 to September 1, 1917, is a proper price for news-print paper.

The commission fixed that price only to the 1st of September, 1917, and their ruling does not cover the period in which the paper is to be furnished under your order.

As a matter of fact, the 2½-cent price was fixed on an investigation of costs of manufacture of the first half of the preceding year, 1916. The conditions to-day are vastly different from those then in existence. The cost of materials, labor, transportation and other elements entering into the manufacture of paper has enormously increased since the date on which the 2½-cent price was fixed.

This company is willing at all times to assist the Government and to furnish paper, as it offered to do in its recent bid, for less than the market price and less than the price it receives under contracts.

It protests most vigorously against the arbitrary action fixing 2½ cents per pound, and hereby gives notice that it reserves its right to appeal, if necessary, to the proper legal authority for the constitutional protection of its property against confiscation.

Feeling, however, that you have no intention of dealing unjustly with an American manufacturer, I beg that you will take under consideration the facts above stated and either make an order permitting us to be paid 3 cents for the paper in question or that some person or committee be authorized to take the matter up with us, so that we may present facts justifying the price named in our bid.

Respectfully submitted.

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
P. T. DODGE, President.

Mr. Dodge followed up this letter with a telegram, under date of August 29, which reads as follows:

NEW YORK, August 29, 1917.

HON. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Your telegraphic emergency order for 200 tons of news paper for Government Printer received. Of course the paper will be furnished without question to meet the Government's requirements. We protest, however, against the price named as unfair and insufficient to give profit and not in compliance with the requirement of law. The price named by the Federal Trade Commission, never assented to, expires 1st of September, and therefore paper ordered by you is not covered by commission's finding of price.

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
P. T. DODGE, President.

In fairness to the International Paper Co., I also submit a letter which I received from the president of that company under date of August 29, 1917, further protesting, in somewhat vigorous language, against the order for news-print paper placed by the Secretary of War at the price fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission. This letter from Mr. Dodge reads as follows:

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
30 Broad Street, New York, August 29, 1917.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Joint Committee on Printing,
Congress of the United States,
Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As you are aware, this company recently furnished paper to the Government Printing Office at 2½ cents per pound, although it was below the price received on contracts and insufficient to give a fair and just return.

Recently we made a bid for 200 tons additional paper at 3 cents per pound. Investigation shows that this price would not give us a profit. The reply to our bid was the accompanying brutal order from the Secretary of War. So that your committee may be advised as to the conditions, I send you herewith copy of my reply to the Secretary of War.

We will, of course, furnish the paper. The price is unfair and unjust, and we reserve our rights, whatever they may be. This corporation stands ready at all times to aid the Government in every reasonable way. It has contributed largely to the expense of sending troops abroad, aiding the allies, and otherwise, and it is to be subjected to very heavy taxation. It is certainly a monstrous wrong that we should be subjected to the treatment we are receiving.

Yours, very truly,

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
P. T. DODGE, President.

P. S.—I also inclose herewith copy of telegram of August 29 sent to the Secretary of War.

It is to be observed that in his letter to the Secretary of War the president of the International Paper Co. assumes that the finding of the Federal Trade Commission as to a fair and reasonable price for news-print paper was limited to the period from March 1 to September 1, 1917. Evidently Mr. Dodge has not been advised of the report, which the Federal Trade Commission submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing on August 15, that the commission is still of the opinion that 2½ cents per pound is a fair and reasonable price for news-print paper and will give the International Paper Co. a "fair, reasonable, average margin of about $5 per ton, or over 10 per cent, or approximately the same profit per ton at which its sales were made prior to the recent period of increased cost and demand."

In reaffirming its finding the commission states that it has taken into consideration the recent increased cost of manufacture, and that the price fixed by it was based upon present conditions and not upon the cost of manufacture of the first half of 1916, as claimed by Mr. Dodge.

It will be observed that in Mr. Dodge's telegram of August 29 to the Secretary of War he states that the price named by the Federal Trade Commission was "never assented to" by the International Paper Co. On this point I call attention to the proposal of certain news-print manufacturers, which is found on pages 136 and 137 of the report of the Federal Trade Commission on news-print paper industry, Senate Document No. 49, Sixty-fifth Congress, the first signature to which is that of the "International Paper Co., by P. T. Dodge, president." In this proposal the news-print paper manufacturers formally asked the Federal Trade Commission "to find, fix, and determine forthwith what price per 100 pounds at the mill would be a fair and reasonable price for the sale of such paper for use in the United States during the period of time from March 1, 1917, to September 1, 1917." In their proposal the news-print paper manufacturers also definitely agreed to carry out and complete at the price fixed upon by the Federal Trade Commission all existing contracts for the sale of news print, and that "new publishers shall not be charged more than said maximum price so found, fixed, and determined by the Federal Trade Commission during said period of time."

In accordance with the proposal of the news-print manufacturers, the Federal Trade Commission made a formal finding, as a result of its exhaustive investigation of the subject, that $2.50 per 100 pounds f. o. b. mill, car lots, was a fair and reasonable price for the sale of standard news print and undertook, at the suggestion of the manufacturers, to have certain publishers release 5 per cent of the news-print tonnage they then had under contract for redistribution to the smaller publishers, so as to make an equitable distribution of news print at the price fixed upon by the Trade Commission.

The news-print manufacturers, however, failed to fulfill their agreement, and finally in May notified the Trade Commission that they had decided to withdraw from the proposed arbitration, stating as their reason for this action that since their proposal was submitted to the commission on February 15, indictments had been brought against a number of the signers of the proposal, including Mr. Dodge, president of the International Paper Co., for alleged violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that as these indictments were unexpected when the agreement was entered into they "desire to give the matter further consideration."

The fact is, therefore, that the news-print manufacturers, including the International Paper Co., did ask the Federal Trade Commission to fix upon a "fair and reasonable price" for newsprint paper, and that in response to this request the commission formally fixed upon 2½ cents per pound as such fair and reasonable price.

The news-print manufacturers have not, so far as I know, furnished any paper to publishers at this price except the delivery to the Government Printing Office, which was made at 2½ cents per pound as a result of my negotiations with the president of the International Paper Co. on May 11. The effort of that company to modify its agreement with the joint committee increasing its price from 2½ cents to 3 cents has brought about the present situation from which I felt the only recourse was an appeal to the President to fix the price of news-print paper as a war supply.

It is extremely gratifying, therefore, that the Government is at last about to enforce the price fixed upon as fair and reasonable for news print through an agency of the Government which apparently has full authority to make its mandate effective.

This result is of particular importance in view of the fact that the Federal Trade Commission, in its report to the Senate on June 13—Senate Document No. 49—stated that "the efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions in the news-print industry expeditiously and to arbitrate and effectively project a fair price for news-print paper have failed." I am hopeful that the enforcement of the Trade Commission's price for news print purchased by the Government will speedily bring about the fixing of that price for the newspapers of the country, to a large number of which, the Trade Commission reports, the increased price means a "difference between a living margin or complete ruin of their business and the suspension of their publications."

BOOK-PAPER SITUATION.

The Government itself is more largely interested in the prices of book paper than it is in the price of news-print paper, owing of course, to the much larger quantities of book paper used in the public printing and binding. The Public Printer's estimates for the contract year 1917-18 called for 26,800,000 pounds of paper, considerably more than one-half of which was book paper alone. The largest single item was approximately 13,000,000 pounds of machine-finish printing paper, which is used for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the documents and reports of Congress. In addition to this, the Public Printer annually requires about 2,000,000 pounds of supercalendered paper, 1,000,000 pounds of coated paper, 5,000,000 pounds of writing paper, more than a million pounds of bond paper, almost a million pounds of ledger paper, 1,000,000 pounds of manila paper, 300,000 pounds of cover paper, 800,000 pounds of bristol board, and 1,500,000 pounds of binder's boards, together with numerous smaller items.

The advance in the price of paper bought by the Government under war conditions began with the contract year of March 1, 1916, to March 1, 1917. The bids for that year were submitted to the joint committee on January 24, 1916. In a number of instances they showed increases from 10 to 20 per cent above the prices paid the preceding year, and in a few cases the increases amounted to about 50 per cent. Such increases the committee did not regard as especially unusual under the circumstances.

In fact, the prices obtained by the committee were considerably lower than those quoted in the open market at that time.

However, soon after these awards were made the contractors apparently came to the conclusion that the Government was obtaining its paper too cheap and a number of them united in an effort to have the committee modify their contracts so as to permit an increase of price or a decrease in the quality of the paper to be furnished at the prices which they had bid for annual contracts.

The committee accorded these contractors a hearing, but declined to yield to their requests. The committee was of the opinion that the contractors had taken war conditions into consideration in submitting their proposals and that the prices bid by them assured at least a fair and reasonable profit, though the paper manufacturers were then making rapid advances in the prices charged the general public. There appeared to be such uniformity in these increases that the committee viewed with some suspicion the effort to impose similar prices upon the Government. Substantiating this view was the following letter which the American Paper & Pulp Association sent out to its members under date of March 14, 1916, urging them to make a "concerted petition" to the committee to allow them higher prices than they had bid on the annual contracts:

AMERICAN PAPER & PULP ASSOCIATION,
New York, March 14, 1916.

GENTLEMEN: When the general Printing Office schedule was bid on in January no one could foresee absolutely the conditions that have arisen.

It is pretty certain that most of those who have bid on Government work will find themselves unable to fulfill their contracts during the coming year except with a loss.

It has appealed to some of the bidders that a concerted petition might be made to the Committee on Printing, which petition made in person before the committee would outline the existing conditions, rapidly getting worse, and point out that under these conditions a material loss would be put upon the mills, and requiring that the mills be allowed to make during such times as the present conditions prevail their contracts at actual cost prices to the Government?

Would you care to become one of the petitioners?

Please favor us with a reply so as to reach here not later than Friday morning, the 17th, if possible.

Yours, very truly,

A. D. NAYLOR,
Secretary-Treasurer.

It is interesting to note in this connection that the bureau of statistics of book paper manufacturers, which the Federal Trade Commission cited in its formal complaint as "engaged in a concerted movement unduly to enhance the prices of book-print paper and to maintain said enhanced prices and to bring about a substantial uniformity of such prices," is closely identified with the American Paper and Pulp Association.

When the committee finally decided on June 5, 1916, not to authorize any modifications of its contracts or standard specifications for paper to be furnished the Public Printer, some of the contractors began refusing to deliver paper under their contracts in excess of the estimated quantities, although the Attorney General had held that the contractors were required to deliver whatever quantity of paper the Government might need during the term of their contracts. This resulted in the Public Printer being required to make open-market purchases of a considerable quantity of paper during the remainder of the contract year and, by direction of the committee, those contractors who failed to furnish paper as ordered by the Public Printer are now being sued by the Government to recover the extra expense it was put to in making these open-market purchases.

On September 7, 1916, the Public Printer appealed to the committee for authority to make an open-market purchase of a large quantity of machine-finish printing paper owing to the default of a certain contractor, and stated that he could obtain only two bids for this paper, one of which covered the full quantity at 11 cents per pound. This seemed to be a most exorbitant price in view of the fact that similar paper had been bought under contract for that year at 3.75 cents per pound, which was approximately the normal price. As the Public Printer was in immediate need of the paper, and it appeared impossible then to obtain a lower price, the purchase was authorized. At the same time, however, I submitted the resolution which was adopted by the Senate on September 7, 1916, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the increases in prices in the various kinds of paper required for printing and binding and to report whether there had been any violation of the antitrust act by the corporations in connection with such advance in prices, with special reference to the prices demanded for book paper necessary for public printing and binding. This resolution, in the first instance, apparently enabled the Public Printer to obtain a reduction in the price asked for machine-finish book paper from 11 to 8 cents per pound, thereby saving more than $11,000 to the Government on that order alone.

To show in further detail the efforts of the paper contractors to have the Joint Committee on Printing grant them an increase in price for the year 1916-17, I submit herewith and ask to have printed, without the accompanying exhibits, as a part of my remarks, the following letter which I addressed to the Federal Trade Commission under date of September 13, 1916, for consideration in connection with the resolution adopted by the Senate on September 7, directing an investigation of the prices of book paper.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
Washington, September 13, 1916.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

SIRS: In connection with Senate resolution No. 269, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the increase in the prices of various kinds of paper required for printing and binding, which was adopted by the Senate on September 7, 1916, I desire to call your attention to the remarks on pages 14011-14012 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date which I made when I offered the resolution in the Senate and to submit in addition thereto the following statement, which may be of service to your commission in conducting the investigation as directed by the Senate.

Shortly after the Joint Committee on Printing had awarded contracts for paper for the public printing and binding for the year beginning March 1, 1916, certain of the contractors began to request modifications of their contracts so as to cheapen the quality of paper they were required to deliver the Government or to increase the price at which they had agreed to furnish paper of the standards required by this committee. These contractors represented that there had been a sudden and unexpected rise in the cost of raw materials used in the manufacture of paper, and that the price of paper, therefore, has advanced far beyond their expectations at the time the bids were submitted to the committee on January 24, 1916. Within two weeks after the contracts became effective the committee received appeals for relief from several of the contractors, including the Kalamazoo Paper Co., of Kalamazoo, Mich.; Champion Coated Paper Co., of Hamilton, Ohio; and the Hawthorne Paper Co., of Kalamazoo, Mich. The committee considered these appeals at its meeting on March 14, 1916, and the companies were advised at that time that the committee could not consent to any changes in the specifications or prices to be paid for paper under contracts which had just become effective on March 1, 1916. The committee was of the opinion that these requests for modifications of the new contracts were premature inasmuch as no paper had been delivered to the Public Printer under the contracts, and consequently the contractors had little or no accurate information at that time upon which to base their claims of possible losses.

It is interesting to note that upon the same day that the committee declined to modify the contracts in the interests of the paper manufacturers the American Pulp and Paper Association sent out a letter from New York under date of March 14, 1916, suggesting to the contractors that they present a concerted petition to the committee requesting that the mills be allowed to furnish paper to the Government at actual cost price instead of at the contract price. A copy of this letter, which was signed by A. D. Naylor, secretary-treasurer of the American Pulp & Paper Co., is attached hereto as Exhibit A.

Apparent corroboration of this activity of the American Pulp and Paper Association is found in a letter which the committee received from the Champion Coated Paper Co., under date of March 16, 1916, replying to communication from the committee that it had decided on March 14 to require paper contractors to comply with the terms of their contracts. In this letter the Champion Coated Paper Co. says: "We have therefore decided to make a request through the American Pulp and Paper Association for the privilege of taking this matter up further with your committee."

The American Pulp and Paper Association, however, never presented its proposed petition to the committee, and I have no information as to its further activities in regard thereto or the replies which were made to its letter of March 14. It is possible that the committee's action of that date may have discouraged any further presentation of the matter for the time.

Several weeks later Mr. H. A. Moses, president of the Strathmore Paper Co., of Mittleague, Mass., seems to have become active in proposing that the paper contractors present another request to the committee for modifications of their contracts. I understand that Mr. Moses personally visited a number of mills to urge their cooperation in this appeal. Under date of May 13, 1916, Mr. Moses wrote the committee, requesting a hearing to "representatives of four or five mills," that they might present the raw-stock market situation for the consideration of the committee. This request was granted and the hearing fixed for May 18, 1916.

At the hearing on May 18 the following paper contractors were present: Mr. H. A. Moses, president of the Strathmore Paper Co., Mittleague, Mass.; Mr. H. M. Knickerbocker, president of the Esleek Manufacturing Co., Turners Falls, Mass.; Mr. Peter G. Tomson, Jr., vice president Champion Coated Paper Co., Hamilton, Ohio; and Mr. R. P. Andrews, president of the R. P. Andrews Paper Co., of Washington, D. C. The committee also had before it letters from the following companies in regard to modifications of their contracts: Aetna Paper Co., Dayton, Ohio; Hawthorne Paper Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.; Kalamazoo Paper Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.; Knowlton Bros. Co., Watertown, N. Y.; Carew Manufacturing Co., South Hadley Falls, Mass. No stenographic report was made of the hearing, but I attach hereto, as Exhibit B, an extract from the minutes of the committee of that date, giving a substantial synopsis of the oral statements submitted.

Subsequently Mr. Moses submitted an additional statement, as requested at the hearing, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit C. Several other contractors also requested reductions in the amount of rag stock to be used in the paper furnished the Government, claiming that the scarcity and high price of rags made it either impossible for them to comply with the Government's specifications or that in so doing they would incur a serious loss. I attach hereto, as Exhibit D, copies of telegrams in this connection received from the Champion Coated Paper Co.

It may interest you to know that the committee had the previous year reduced the quantity of rag required in certain writing papers from 50 to 25 per cent and in others from 75 to 50 per cent for the year beginning March 1, 1915, and that this reduction was carried in the specifications for the present year. The reductions had been made to meet possible increases in the cost of rag stock due to the European war. In this connection, however, I call your attention to the following letter which the committee received from True & McClelland, 127 Federal Street, Boston, Mass., under date of December 23, 1914:

"We see it announced that your committee has reduced the amount of rag paper, owing to the possibility of shortage of rags owing to the European war.

"We beg to advise, as importers of European rags, that this article is a drug at the present. We have an abundance, and find much difficulty in selling them, because the mills are overstocked.

"This condition is likely to continue."

This firm may be able to furnish you with information as to whether there has been such a shortage of rags as paper manufacturers represent.

At its meeting on June 5, 1916, the committee finally decided not to authorize any modifications in the standard specifications for paper to be furnished the Public Printer under existing contracts and the Public Printer was notified to require all contractors to comply with the terms and conditions of their contracts. This action was based largely upon the fact that the contractors had made a substantial increase on practically every lot of paper upon which they bid for the year beginning March 1, 1916, indicating that they must have given consideration at that time to the rise in the cost of raw materials. Some of the increases under existing contracts exceed 50 per cent, such increases being made by two of the companies, the Champion Coated Paper Co. and the Strathmore Paper Co., which were particularly active in urging that the committee grant them additional increases over and above their contract prices. In numerous instances increases under existing contracts run from 10 to 20 per cent above the prices paid last year.

That the bidders must have given some consideration to the increased cost is also shown by a letter which the committee received from the Carew Manufacturing Co., of South Hadley Falls, Mass., under date of May 16, 1916, in which that company stated: "We must frankly admit that we made our bid in January last with some idea at least that prices would rule higher, and we are willing, therefore, to take our medicine in spite of the serious condition of affairs."

The committee also took into consideration a petition filed with your commission by the executive committee of the News Print Manufacturers Association in which that association stated that "about 85 per cent of the news print manufactured in the United States and Canada is sold on annual contracts and these contract prices have not increased more than 1 per cent during the past 12 months, and will not average any higher than the price at which it was contracted and sold during the past 10 years."

The committee also had a copy of a letter written by the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co., under date of April 4, 1916, stating that "We are carrying out and expect to carry out to the letter the contracts we have, and, in our opinion, other contractors should be obligated to do the same."

The following item from the Paper Trade Journal of April 20, 1916, under Kalamazoo, Mich., date of April 15, was also of interest to the committee in connection with a letter from the Hawthorne Paper Co., under date of March 14, 1916, stating that it would "sustain some very serious losses this year on our contract" and asking the Government to pay an advance price over and above the contract price for paper to be furnished the Public Printer:

"The Hawthorne Paper Co. increases its capital stock from $400,000 to $500,000, articles of incorporation at Lansing having been amended to show the change. The additional capital will be used to pay for the many improvements that are now being made at the mill. The company recently doubled the size of its power plant and it is also making many other improvements about the mill. Another new machine will soon be added and other necessary equipment installed. The Hawthorne Co. is finding it difficult to take care of all of the business that is coming its way at the present time."

In view of the foregoing facts the committee did not feel justified in granting any increase to the paper contractors, and it did not, therefore, go into the question as to whether it has any authority to modify its contracts, of which there may be serious doubt.

No further appeal has been made to the committee to cheapen the quality or increase the price of paper now under contract, but it is a significant fact that these companies have refrained from bidding on numerous open-market lots of paper since the committee's action of June 5. The result has been that the Public Printer has been forced to pay whatever noncompetitive price he could obtain for paper required to continue the necessary work of the Government Printing Office.

In addition to the apparent resentment over the committee's refusal to accede to their demands for an increase of contract prices the paper contractors seem to have taken serious exception to an opinion which the Attorney General has rendered at the request of this committee. That opinion construes the existing contracts as requiring the paper contractors to deliver whatever quantity of paper may be required for the public printing and binding during the term of the contract, regardless of the quantities as estimated in advance by the Public Printer. The opinion came about in this way: The Republic Bag & Paper Co., of New York City, entered into a contract to furnish news-print paper to the Government Printing Office for a period of six months, beginning March 1, 1916, estimated quantity being stated at 300,000 pounds, but the contract providing that "the contractor must furnish the quantity which may be needed, whether more or less than estimated." On March 24 the Public Printer advised the committee that he had already ordered in excess of the estimated quantity, and that the Republic Bag & Paper Co. declined to deliver any more paper on its contract for the six-month period. On April 10 the committee requested the President to obtain an opinion of the Attorney General construing the contract as to the quantity of paper that may be ordered thereunder. On May 9 an informal opinion was obtained from the Attorney General, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit E, and this opinion was subsequently made formal by the Attorney General under date of June 13, 1916.

On May 18 the Champion Coated Paper Co. notified the Public Printer that it would not furnish any paper on certain lots in excess of the estimated quantities. As a result of this opinion the Champion Coated Paper Co. was declared in default of its contract on certain lots on June 9 and 10, 1916, and the Republic Bag & Paper Co. was declared in default of its contract for news-print paper on June 9, 1916.

There may be some significance in the fact that about the time (June 5) that the committee declined to grant paper manufacturers an increase in their contract prices two contractors were declared in default (June 9) for refusing to furnish paper in such quantities as might be ordered by the Public Printer under their contracts as construed by the Attorney General.

I have presented this rather lengthy recital of preliminary events that you may determine what influence, if any, they have had on subsequent developments. It may be that the paper manufacturers and dealers have entered into an agreement, informal or otherwise, to refrain from competitive bidding on paper required by the Public Printer on account of the Government's attitude toward their present contracts. If such an agreement has been entered into it would appear to be a violation of section 2 of the Clayton Antitrust Act, which prohibits price discrimination where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. Of this I have no evidence further than the facts as related by the Public Printer in his efforts to obtain bids on open-market purchases of paper since June 9.

On June 7 the Public Printer requested open-market proposals on 36,000 pounds of white machine-finish printing paper. On this request he received three proposals, including one from the Champion Coated Paper Co., which seems to have been the last proposal submitted by that company since it was declared in default on certain lots of paper on June 9. The lowest bid on this paper was by the Jessup & Moore Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., at 7 cents per pound, the same paper having been bought the previous year under contract of the Jessup & Moore Co. at 3.49 cents per pound.

On June 15, 1916, the Public Printer requested open-market proposals on 220,000 pounds of white news-print paper and 603,800 pounds machine-finish printing paper. The Public Printer stated in his letter to the committee, under date of June 27, 1916, that he had "circularized and advertised among about 40 mills and dealers in papers of these descriptions soliciting quotations for furnishing the quantities of paper described" with a result that only one bid was received on furnishing the 220,000 pounds news-print paper, the price quoted being 3.75 cents per pound. On the machine-finish printing paper there were four items on which no bids were received, and on three items only one bid was received. None of the bids submitted was based on Government standards, all quotations being for a quality of paper represented by samples submitted with the quotations. The Public Printer further states that "the lack of interest on the part of manufacturers and dealers in the invitation to bid is suggestive that further efforts will not be productive of any better results." The prices quoted on the machine-finish printing paper range from 6.7 cents to 7.3 cents per pound, while the same paper was bought under contract the preceding year at from 3.34 to 3.75 cents per pound.

Again, on June 27, 1916, the Public Printer informed the committee that in response to his request of June 15 for open-market purchases on 152,000 pounds of white machine-finish printing paper he had received only one bid of 8.3 cents per pound. This paper was bought under contract last year at 3.74 cents per pound. The Champion Coated Paper Co. refused to furnish the paper in excess of 10,000 pounds under its blanket-lot contract for this year at 4.22 cents per pound.

On July 21 the Public Printer requested proposals on 400,000 pounds of news-print paper. Under date of July 29, 1916, the Public Printer advised the committee that "having repeatedly called for open-market proposals for this paper in various amounts I have either obtained no bids or those which we consider unsatisfactory, and as a last resort have called for proposals based on paper which might be furnished by the bidder, waiving the specifications for color, etc., and as a result of this effort have obtained only one bid from Weinstock & Son (Inc.), as per inclosed copy." The accepted order of Weinstock & Son was 5½ cents per pound for news-print paper, of which the Republic Bag & Paper Co., of New York, had declined to furnish additional quantities at its contract price of 3 cents per pound. Last year the contract price for the same paper was 2.25 cents per pound. Weinstock & Son are located in New York City, as is the Republic Bag & Paper Co.

On July 29, 1916, the Public Printer requested open-market proposals on 400,000 pounds white machine-finish printing paper, samples to be submitted by bidder. Under date of August 12, 1916, the Public Printer advised the committee that "in a recent effort to obtain quotations for furnishing this quantity and class of paper only one bid was received, the price being 8.3 cents per pound, submitted by O. H. Gore." A subsequent quotation was received from the New York & Pennsylvania Co., at 7.25 cents per pound, based upon acceptance within the week and delivery in October and November. This paper was purchased last year under contract at 3.55 cents per pound, the contractor being the New York & Pennsylvania Co., of New York City.

On August 24, 1916, the Public Printer invited open-market proposals on 310,000 pounds of white machine-finish printing paper, requesting the bidders to submit samples of their own paper. The Public Printer received only one bid on the 310,000 pounds, and that from a Washington broker at 11 cents per pound, totaling $34,100. The same paper was furnished under contract last year at 3.75 cents per pound. Increase asked on this one lot alone amounted to $22,475. In his letter to the committee of September 7, 1916, the Public Printer says:

"In view of the fruitless effort to interest manufacturers of paper in submitting quotations for Government requirements, I feel that the situation is imperative enough to request that some action be taken whereby the Government will be enabled to purchase paper for the public printing and binding work at a reasonable price."

It was this last observation of the Public Printer that induced me to offer the resolution directing your commission to investigate the increase in the price of paper with special reference to the prices demanded for paper necessary for the public printing and binding. Whether in prearranged plan or not, it is a fact, as clearly shown by the foregoing statements of the Public Printer, that paper manufacturers and dealers are refusing to bid on paper required for the public printing and binding. For more than three months now the Public Printer has been compelled to rely upon one or two Washington jobbers for the supply of paper that he is required to purchase in the open market. In the last month or two these bids have been received from practically only one local jobber. It appears to me, therefore, that an investigation ought to be made as to whether or not there is discrimination against the Government in the supply and prices of paper.

This seeming discrimination may be directed against the Government Printing Office alone on account of its contractors being required to comply with their contracts. It has been stated that other establishments of the Government, such as the Post Office Department, the General Supply Committee, and the Quartermaster Department of the Army, have been somewhat more successful in obtaining competitive proposals for furnishing paper required by them. I would suggest that inquiry be made of these establishments also to determine whether the Government Printing Office has been singled out to alone bear the brunt of the exorbitant and noncompetitive prices which paper manufacturers are demanding for their product.

The Public Printer can furnish detailed information in regard to the difficulties he has had in obtaining proposals for paper, and I would also suggest that you request him to submit such information to your commission.

I submit herewith as Exhibit F a copy of the proposal for furnishing paper for the public printing and binding for the year beginning March 1, 1916. This proposal shows the classes of paper required for the public printing and binding. The Senate resolution, as you will observe, directs a special inquiry to be made into the advance of prices of such paper. Most of the lots of paper included in the proposal are covered by annual contracts for the year beginning March 1, 1916, and I submit an abstract of such contracts as Exhibit G. A comparison of this abstract with the abstract for the year beginning March 1, 1915 (Exhibit H), will show the advance in prices on the contract lots. The Public Printer can make a direct comparison of these prices and show the percentage of increase in each instance if you so desire.

The greatest increase in prices, however, has been on the open-market purchases which the Public Printer has been required to make of certain lots of paper, particularly news-print and machine-finish printing papers, owing to the default of certain contractors, as I have already stated. I presume your present inquiry into the advance in the price of news-print paper will cover that particular kind of paper sufficiently for the purposes of the investigation I have proposed, except possibly as there may appear to be some special discrimination against the Government in the furnishing of news-print paper for its use.

Owing to existing contracts, many of which have been complied with in good faith by the present contractors, the Public Printer's difficulty has been confined chiefly to the purchase of machine-finish printing paper which is largely used by the Government Printing Office in the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the vast number of congressional and departmental documents and reports. An adequate and prompt supply of this paper is absolutely necessary for the operation of the Government Printing Office, and of this fact the paper manufacturers are well aware.

The necessity of large open-market purchases of news-print and machine-finish printing papers by the Public Printer was brought about by the default of three contractors for these items. The default of the Republic Bag & Paper Co., of New York, on news-print paper has already been related. The National Contracting Co., of New York City, after submitting the lowest bid for furnishing approximately 6,000,000 pounds of machine-finish printing paper, failed to enter into a contract in accordance with the terms of its proposal. Subsequently the Champion Coated Paper Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, refused to furnish machine-finish printing paper on its two blanket lots, Nos. 20 and 21, in excess of 100 per cent above the estimated quantities for such paper. The defaults of these three companies have accordingly been reported to the Solicitor of the Treasury, and I understand that he is preparing to bring suit against them. Meanwhile the Public Printer is having the greatest difficulty to obtain paper required for the public printing, and according to trade reports there does not appear to be much prospect for a relief from the present high prices. In this connection I quote from the New York Market Review, published in the Paper Trade Journal under date of August 31, 1916:

"The general attitude of the trade is that all grades of paper will continue to rise in price for some months to come, owing to the great scarcity and the ever-increasing demand."

This situation is of special concern to the Joint Committee on Printing in view of the fact that it must award contracts on or before February 1, 1917, for paper required for the public printing and binding for the year beginning March 1, 1917, and it is especially in the interest of the Government that a report be had before that time, if possible as to whether the paper manufacturers are justified in maintaining the present high prices and continuing the same.

In connection with the investigation I presume, of course, that you will also look into the complaints of the paper manufacturers that they have had to pay excessive prices for wood pulp, rag stock, and other raw materials entering into their product. The paper manufacturers and jobbers appear to base their increase of prices upon the great advance in the cost of these materials due, as they assert, to the European war conditions. I notice in the Paper Trade Journal of August 31, 1916, that peeled pulp wood is quoted at Watertown, N. Y., at $13.50 per cord, and that the general manager of the Somerville-Ellsworth Pulp Wood Co., of that city, believes the price will go to $15, owing to the shortage in Canada. In the same issue of the Paper Trade Journal there is a very interesting article relating to pulp-wood opportunities in national forests, in which Chief Forester Graves is quoted as stating that the cost of pulp-wood timber delivered to the mill from the national forests would not often be more than $3 per cord.

Under date of August 3, 1916, the Secretary of Agriculture addressed a letter to the President in regard to the print-paper situation. In this letter the Secretary of Agriculture makes the interesting statement that "the Forest Service has offered for sale at various times large amounts of timber on the national forests in logging chances favorable for pulp operations. These areas are located mainly in the Pacific Northwest and in Alaska, and offer combinations of suitable and cheap timber with large quantities of easily developed water power. Up to the present time it has not been possible to make such sales. The chief difficulty has been that the western markets have been fully supplied, and, in fact, mill capacity probably has been in excess of market demands."

In view of these statements I believe the advance in the price of pulp wood ought to be thoroughly investigated, particularly as the Government appears to have pulp wood available, at $3 or less per cord, with no bidders, while pulp mills claim that they will soon have to pay from $15 to $17 per cord.

The rag market may also be a fruitful field of inquiry in connection with this investigation, as, you know, rags are used largely in the manufacture of the higher grades of paper. Paper manufacturers have contended for several months that it is impossible for them to obtain rags regardless of price. They contend that munition makers are now large consumers of rags. On the other hand, the Public Printer recently advised the committee that he had been informed by the manager of a big munition plant that such plants were using only a small quantity of rags in the production of explosives. There has been an inclination on the part of some jobbers, paper manufacturers, pulp-mill men, and rag dealers to each charge the other with demanding excessive prices and thereby making large profits out of the present paper situation. Whether the jobber, the manufacturer, or the pulp mills are being enriched at the expense of the others, I do not know, but this fact is certain, that the consumers of paper, including the Government have to pay the price. The committee was recently informed by a stockholder in a Kalamazoo company—the Paper Co., I believe—that he was receiving a dividend of $400 a month on $10,000 stock in that company. This tremendous profit hardly seems credible, but his statement was made freely and in apparent good faith. If such profits are general in the paper trade, I believe your investigation will prove of great benefit to the public.

Respectfully, yours,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

Mr. FLETCHER. The next serious situation that confronted the joint committee was in an effort to obtain contracts for paper for the year beginning March 1, 1917. Recognizing the probable inability of some manufacturers under war conditions to contract for furnishing paper for the full period of a year at a fixed price, the committee inserted a new paragraph in the proposal providing that whenever the fair and reasonable market price for any paper varies 20 per cent or more above or below the accepted price either party may annul the contract after 15 days' notice in writing on the expiration of either 3, 6, or 9 months from the beginning of the contract year. It was believed that such a provision would protect the paper contractors from any substantial loss due to any unexpected increase in the price of raw materials and at the same time protect the Government from exorbitantly high prices for paper.

However, when the bids were opened on January 20, 1917, it was found that there had been little or no compensation for the various lots of book paper included in the committee's schedule for the Government Printing Office.

Figuring on the estimated quantities at the lowest prices bid, the amount asked for the various classes of paper for the year beginning March 1, 1917, totaled $2,542,458, which was an increase, based on the estimated quantities for the preceding year, of $1,136,280, and an increase over the year 1915-16 of $1,438,561.17. The increases in the majority of the lots considerably exceeded 100 per cent, especially in the book papers. The committee accordingly rejected all the proposals except on some items of writing, bond, and ledger papers, for which there appeared to be fair competition and only moderate increases in prices as compared with the advances made on the book papers. The committee then called for new bids to be submitted on February 17, but again the prices seemed to be exorbitantly high, and all of the second proposals were rejected, the Public Printer being directed to purchase paper in the open market until such time as the committee might decide to call for contract proposals.

One of the bidders, the Champion Coated Paper Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, which claims to have submitted the lowest bids on paper amounting to $1,787,784, under the committee's request for proposals on February 17, brought suit against the joint committee to enforce an award of contract at the exorbitant prices demanded by it. Justice Siddons, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in denying the application of the Champion Co. for a rule on the committee in re its application for a writ of mandamus to compel the committee to award it contracts on the basis of the Champion Co.'s bids, held:

To comply with the prayer of this petition would in effect call for a construction of the law under which this court would have to require the committee to award contracts to the lowest and best bidder, no matter what price was submitted in the proposal or bid. To so hold would be to place the Government completely at the mercy of bidders. No matter how outrageously high a price might be tested by market and other appropriate conditions to be considered, if it happened to be the lowest and best bid, the contract, nevertheless, must be awarded.

During the first two and one-half months of the present contract year a saving of $68,991.75 was made by open-market purchases of paper at less than the lowest bids therefor which were rejected by the committee on February 17, 1917. At this rate the saving for the year will approximately be $350,000, but it is quite likely to run close to $500,000, in view of the continuing decrease in open-market prices and the larger quantities of paper which the Public Printer has been required to buy owing to unexpected war emergencies. A detailed statement of such open-market purchases was submitted to the Federal Trade Commission on May 19, 1917, for its consideration in connection with the investigation of book-paper prices, a copy of which I ask leave to have printed as a part of my remarks, without the appendices.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
May 19, 1917.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

SIRS: In connection with your investigation of the increase in prices of paper for the public printing and binding, as directed by a resolution of the Senate (S. Res. 269, 64th Cong.) of September 7, 1916, I am pleased to submit for your consideration a record of open-market paper purchases made by the Public Printer under the direction and with the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing from March 1 to May 15, 1917.

These open-market purchases were made necessary by the committee's action in rejecting as excessive most of the bids submitted to it on January 20 and February 17, 1917, in response to its request for proposals for furnishing paper for the Government Printing Office for the year beginning March 1, 1917. I inclose herewith a schedule of such proposals and an abstract of the contracts awarded by the committee for the year beginning March 1, 1917. This abstract shows that the committee accepted the proposals on only 92 out of the 222 lots included in its paper schedule. All of these awards are subject to the provisions contained in paragraph No. 13 of the proposal, a copy of which I inclose herewith. Paragraph No. 13 provides, in brief, that "whenever the fair and reasonable market price for any paper proposed for herein varies 20 per cent or more above or below the accepted proposal price" either party may annul the contract at the expiration of either three, six, or nine months from March 1, 1917. The conditions of this paragraph, therefore, add greatly to the interest which the committee has in the report that you may make in response to the resolution of the Senate.

I thought the inclosed record of open-market purchases might be of some interest or service to the commission in its investigation by indicating the trend of prices paid by the Government for paper bought in the open market during the first two and one-half months of its present contract year, which began March 1. During that period the Public Printer has bought paper in the open market to the amount of $311,809.13, which would have cost the Government $380,800.83 had the committee awarded annual contracts therefor to the lowest bidder on the basis of the proposals submitted to it on January 20 and February 17, 1917. In other words, the rejection of such bids by the committee has effected a net saving of $68,991.75 for the first two and one-half months of the present contract year. On only three small lots—cover paper and binder's board—the Public Printer been required to pay in excess of the bids submitted to the committee on the annual schedule, and the increased cost in these instances totaled less than $700. The committee's action in rejecting the annual proposals on all except certain coated book, writing, bond, and ledger papers appears, therefore, to have been materially to the advantage of the Government.

The commission may be specially interested in the purchases of white news-print paper for the Government, since you have made a separate and very valuable investigation of that subject. I inclose as "Appendix A" to this letter certain communications with the Public Printer and the International Paper Co. relative to the purchase of white news print now required by the Government Printing Office in the publication of the Official Bulletin issued under the direction of the President. You will observe that the International Paper Co. has agreed to furnish news print at 2½ cents per pound f. o. b. mill, the price fixed upon by the Trade Commission as a fair and reasonable one. The Public Printer advised the committee that he had not been able to obtain a price of less than 3.1 cents per pound f. o. b. mill for news print, and that on only a single car lot. His requests for open-market proposals on 400,000 pounds of news print brought only three responses from jobbers, the lowest price quoted being 4 cents per pound. In view of the findings of your commission that 2½ cents per pound is a fair and reasonable price for news print, I did not feel like approving the purchase of news print at a higher price, and accordingly took the matter up direct with the president of the International Paper Co. The inclosed correspondence shows the success of my efforts in this regard and the generous and patriotic offer of the president of the International Paper Co. to furnish paper required by the present military situation at the price fixed upon by your commission. I am very glad, therefore, to tell you how helpful the work of the Federal Trade Commission has been in connection with the purchase of news-print paper for the Government Printing Office.

The following table shows the range of bids and prices for news print as considered by this committee during the past year:

News-print prices.

May 10, 1917, open-market bid (three bidders)	.04
May 11, 1917, price quoted joint committee (International)	.025

I also submit as "Appendix B" correspondence with the New York & Pennsylvania Co. and the Oxford Paper Co., both of which have offices at 200 Fifth Avenue, New York City, in regard to their offer to furnish a limited quantity of machine-finish and sized and supercalendered printing paper at less than the market price. This offer was said to cover such paper as these companies did not have under contract, but they have recently advised the Public Printer that they can not continue to fill his orders on account of their limited supply. The Public Printer has therefore been compelled to again call for open-market proposals, which are somewhat higher than the prices quoted by the New York & Pennsylvania Co. and the Oxford Paper Co.

The following tables show the trend of price on white machine-finish and sized and supercalendered printing paper as quoted to and paid by the Government Printing Office during the past year:

The record of open-market purchases since March 1, 1917, will also show a very remarkable decrease in the prices quoted to the committee on January 20 and February 17, 1917, for certain paper as compared with the prices paid for similar paper bought in the open market since March 1, 1917. I invite your attention especially to the following lots:

Lot 192. Back lining paper	.042	.10
Lots 204-205. Lithograph comb paper (per ream)	9.50	20.00

Trusting that this information may be of some service to you in the investigation of paper prices and assuring you of the committee's hearty appreciation of the generous and helpful cooperation your commission has already rendered to the committee in its effort to obtain paper for the Government at a fair and reasonable price, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

Mr. FLETCHER. This brings me down to the final report on the book-paper industry that was submitted to the Senate by the Federal Trade Commission on August 21, 1917, in response to the resolution which I offered on September 7, 1916.

It is especially gratifying to the joint committee that the findings of the Trade Commission, in regard to the advance in book-paper prices and the unfair methods of competition adopted by certain paper manufacturers, fully justify the committee in the course which it has pursued in the purchase of paper for the Government Printing Office.

The book-paper report shows that during the first three months of 1917 the average profits of 24 leading book-paper mills amounted to $37.21 per ton, or 261 per cent more than the average profits of the same mills for 1915, while the costs of manufacture increased only 38 per cent. The average profits of the same mills in 1916 was $16.55 per ton and in 1915, $10.31.

For the first three months of 1917 the average profits for mills with the lowest profits was $17.06, and the average profits for mills with the highest profits was $72.10 per ton. In 1916 the lowest average of profits was $5.55 per ton and the highest average profits, $46.53. For 1915 the lowest average of profits was $4.78 per ton and the highest average profits, $9.58.

The average profits on investments in 1915 was 8.7 per cent and for 1916 21.5 per cent, the increased average profit on investment for 21 mills amounting to 147 per cent.

In its conclusions on the book-paper industry the Federal Trade Commission states:

The foregoing findings of fact support the conclusion that the advance in the prices of book paper in 1916 was excessive and not justified either by the increase in cost or by the changes in conditions of supply and demand. The advance was brought about in part by the activities of the members and secretary of their bureau of statistics.

The book-paper report also contains some interesting observations in regard to the activities of the book-paper manufacturers through their bureau of statistics. This report has developed the fact that the members of the bureau of statistics held a general meeting in June, 1916, about the time that some of its members were urging the joint committee to increase their contract prices for book paper, at which meeting the representative of a prominent member concerned stated, referring to his own company, that "the public has ground them down for years and they are going to make the public pay now."

The correspondence of the bureau of statistics also shows that, somewhat earlier last year, another of its members stated, in a letter, that "opportunity should not be lost for making money that had not been made in the past." He suggested that customers be made to pay the price and "get it back from their customers."

It appears also that the bureau of statistics held a "general" meeting in New York City on January 7, 1916, which was shortly before bids were submitted to the joint committee for the paper-contract year beginning March 1, 1916, and that on January 22, 1916, two days before the opening of bids by the joint committee, one book-paper manufacturer wrote to another that he appreciated "that there is a tendency everywhere to try to force better prices."

In this connection the report of the Trade Commission states:

An effort to "force better prices" and to have the prices uniform as to all manufacturers during this period is clearly shown by the correspondence (of the bureau of statistics, book-paper manufacturers). Manufacturers were frequently notifying the trade and other manufacturers of price advances, and almost invariably giving as the reason the increasing cost of raw materials. That there was not cost justification for the prices charged there is abundant evidence. A member of the bureau (the only one who seems to have held off from joining the movement to unduly enhance prices), in answering a letter of February 25, 1916, from another member, stating that the latter had been compelled to advance prices again, as the advance of February 1 did not check the rush of orders, said that he was disappointed to see his correspondent "make extraordinary advances which could have no present cost justification," and among other letters he wrote one to another member who had notified him of an advance, and in the letter he said: "Many of the mills are merely taking advantage of the present abnormal conditions. There certainly could be nothing in your cost of doing business which could warrant these frequent advances, and they are obviously for one of two reasons, or both—either to stop orders or 'cash in' so far as possible on the present market."

The book-paper report, further discussing the activities of the members of the bureau of statistics, adds this interesting bit of information:

Indicative of common knowledge of and responsibility for proposed advances is a letter written on June 9, 1916, a little more than a week before one of the general price advances in book paper, by a prominent member to a wholesaler: "I want you to get under cover if you think you want any of our papers at this price," and on the margin of the letter he wrote: "Fireworks about to start. Get busy, either with me or elsewhere. Suit yourself, but consider service." This brought orders from the wholesaler, and on June 19, 1916, the date on which the manufacturer advanced his prices, the latter wrote the same wholesaler: "It is indeed a pleasure to see you get 'under cover.' Many have insisted that prices were going to drop, and have held off accordingly, and will have to take their 'medicine.' Prices will go higher."

This latter correspondence adds new light to the efforts of certain paper contractors to force higher prices on the Government and their refusal to deliver paper in excess of the estimated quantities, despite the fact that in previous years they had never questioned the right of the Government to order under its contracts such quantities of paper as might be needed during the year, whether more or less than the stated estimates, and, in fact, had heretofore been extremely anxious to sell the Government largely in excess of the estimated quantities.

The chairman and secretary of the bureau of statistics of the book paper manufacturers were in Washington at the time of the opening of paper bids by the Joint Committee for the year beginning March 1, 1917, and seemed to be much perturbed over the fact that the committee had rejected all the proposals. The chairman of the bureau submitted bids for several lots of paper, and there may be no significance attached to his presence at the opening of the proposals, in as much as all the bidders were invited to attend, but it might be of some interest whether the presence of the secretary of the bureau, who is charged by the Trade Commission with being the guiding spirit of the book-paper organization, had anything to do with the fact that a number of the more important proposals were submitted to the committee just prior to the hour set for the opening and whether these bidders had any mutual understanding as to their prices. Of this the committee has no definite knowledge, but the following statement from the report of the Federal Trade Commission is particularly significant in that connection:

The investigations of the commission disclosed that the book paper manufacturers, especially those belonging to their bureau of statistics, by correspondence, meetings, and in other ways have kept one another informed of market conditions, prices, etc., so that prices were advanced simultaneously without fear of competition.

While ostensibly the duties of the secretary of their bureau of statistics have been to compile and distribute certain statistical information, his principal efforts would appear to have been devoted to encouraging members to increase their prices. This was done by correspondence, use of telephone and telegraph, attending meetings, and holding personal conferences with members.

As a result of the investigation, which the Federal Trade Commission undertook at the instigation of the Joint Committee on Printing, the commission has filed a formal complaint against the bureau of statistics of the book paper manufacturers, Charles F. Moore, secretary of that bureau, and the following paper manufacturers, charging them with using unfair methods of competition in interstate commerce in violation of the provisions of section 5 of the act creating the Federal Trade Commission, approved September 26, 1914:

American Writing Paper Co., Holyoke, Mass.; Dill & Collins Co., Philadelphia, Pa.; Diana Paper Co., Harrisville, N. Y.; New York & Pennsylvania Co., New York City; M. & W. H. Nixon Paper Co., Manayunk, Philadelphia, Pa.; Oxford Paper Co., New York City; Ticonderoga Pulp & Paper Co., New York City; Tileston & Hollingsworth Co., Boston, Mass.; Wanaque River Paper Co., Wanaque, N. J.; West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co., New York City; Bardeen Paper Co., Otsego, Mich.; Berges-town Paper Co., Neenah, Wis.; Bryant Paper Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.; Champion Coated Paper Co., Hamilton, Ohio; Everett Pulp & Paper Co., Everett, Wash.; Kimberly-Clark Co., Neenah, Wis.; King Paper Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.; Lakeside Paper Co., Neenah, Wis.; Mead Pulp & Paper Co., Dayton, Ohio; Miami Paper Co., West Carrollton, Ohio; Monarch Paper Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.; Rex Paper Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.; and S. D. Warren & Co., Boston, Mass.

Seven of these companies submitted substantially all the bids that the joint committee received on book paper when proposals were invited for this year's contracts, and it was due to their exorbitant demands that the committee decided to reject nearly all the bids and directed the Public Printer to buy paper in the open market for the time being, which, as I have already stated, has resulted in a very large saving to the Government.

Hearing on the Trade Commission's complaint will be held on October 10. The specific complaint against the book-paper manufacturers is as follows:

That said respondents through said bureau of statistics and particularly through its secretary, Charles F. Moore, are now and for about two years last past have been engaged in a concerted movement unduly to enhance the prices of book-print paper and to maintain said enhanced prices and to bring about a substantial uniformity of such prices, due allowance being made for grades, brands, etc. As a result of such activities, prices of book-print paper in the United States have been unduly enhanced and such enhanced prices are being maintained. Such enhancement and substantial uniformity of prices have been effected and are being maintained through the medium of telephone communications, by correspondence, and by personal meetings between the secretary and various respondent members of said bureau of statistics, and by like communications between various members thereof, and by such communications between members and others engaged in the book-print paper industry.

Concluding its recent report on the book-paper industry, the Federal Trade Commission submitted these recommendations to Congress as to legislative remedies for relief from excessive prices:

In its preliminary report of this investigation the commission recommended as a war emergency measure that all print-paper mills and distributing agencies operate on Government account during the continuation of the war and that the total product be pooled in the hands of a governmental agency so that it may be equitably distributed at a fair price based upon cost of production and a reasonable profit per ton. These recommendations the commission wishes to renew, since it believes that under existing abnormal conditions immediate relief to publishers can only be obtained by the adoption of some such legislation.

The commission also desires to call the attention of the Congress to the necessity for the enactment of legislation regulating the activities of trade associations. The print-paper and other investigations of the commission show that trade associations, although originally organized for legitimate purposes and often engaged in helpful activities which serve a useful purpose, nevertheless some of them indulge frequently in practices which tend to destroy competition and defeat the objects of the Sherman law.

The commission's print-paper investigations show that the activities of the trade associations connected with the news-print and book-paper industries have contributed to the rise in price of these commodities and that the effective regulation and supervision of such activities by some governmental agency would tend to restore healthy competition in these industries and thereby to reduce prices to a more normal basis.

A bill covering the commission's recommendations in regard to the pooling of print paper in the hands of a governmental agency as a war emergency measure is now pending with the Senate Committee on Printing. Whether Congress will enact such legislation depends, in my opinion, upon the attitude of the paper manufacturers themselves in speedily ending the necessity for such legislation.

I am hopeful that, in view of the order of the President in fixing the price of news-print paper at 2½ cents, as found by the Federal Trade Commission to be a fair compensation, the news-print manufacturers will at once recognize the justice of such action and make their product available to the newspaper publishers of the country at this figure without any further action on the part of the Government.

The report of the Trade Commission on the book-paper industry also ought to have a very salutary effect upon the book-paper manufacturers who have taken advantage of the war situation to exact excessive prices for their product, and I trust it will discourage any further efforts on their part to use unfair methods of competition.

WAR CREDITS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5901, providing for an additional issue of bonds, and so forth.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I hope Senators will, so far as their convenience may permit, remain in the Senate during the day. I say this because I am anxious to have this bill disposed of to-day. I can not think that there will be a desire on the part of Senators to engage in any protracted debate during the consideration of this measure for the reason, among other things, that its earliest possible enactment is of paramount public importance.

The Secretary of the Treasury stated to the Committee on Finance that he could not take any definite step for the printing of the bonds or other securities provided for until this bill was passed. If the bill is passed, it will require the printing of a very great number of bonds and other forms of securities, running into many millions—into many more millions of forms than the millions stated in dollars as named in the bill, and this, of course, is evident. For example, where a certain amount of bonds in dollars is authorized to be issued, it will be necessary, in printing the bonds, to multiply that amount somewhat indefinitely. In addition to that, the Secretary is compelled to organize his movement or campaign in the way of offering these bonds for sale. That is a very great task, and it will take considerable time to complete that organization. The Secretary of the Treasury stated that he regarded the speedy passage of this bill as the most urgent thing now before the Congress. It is for reasons of this kind that I am anxious to have the bill disposed of during this day before adjournment; hence my request of Senators to remain at least in call as far as that is possible for them.

Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there is any minority report?

Mr. STONE. There is none.

Mr. LEWIS. Then there is no filed opposition to the measure whatever.

Mr. STONE. There is no filed opposition. One member of the Finance Committee stated in the committee, I think it is not improper to say this, that he reserved the right to offer amendments to the bill, but no formal minority report has been filed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He did not indicate that he had any amendment to propose.

Mr. STONE. As the Senator from Georgia has said, the Senator making that announcement in the committee did not indicate that he had any amendments to propose, but he reserved the right, which, in my opinion, was not necessary, to offer amendments.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator is quite confident that there are no minority Senators who could regard any advantage taken of them if the measure is pressed now?

Mr. STONE. There is not. The Senator who made the statement I have referred to is fully aware of my purpose to call up the bill at this time. He knows that, because I told him so within the last 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before the reading proceeds I wish to detain the Senate for a short time to make a statement I think will be of interest and of some value to the Senate.

I hold in my hand a statement prepared by Mr. McCoy, of the Treasury Department, who for years has served as an expert of that department, and representing the department served in that capacity with great acceptability. I take pleasure in saying, before the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House while these committees were considering revenue or financial legislation. This statement is printed in the document entitled "Senate and House Hearings on Second Emergency Bond Issues," which has been laid on the tables of Senators this morning, and will be found at page 58 of that publication. This I will at this point incorporate in my remarks.

It is unnecessary to particularly analyze this statement. It is sufficient to say that it shows that the act of April 24, 1917, authorized the issue of five billion of bonds, and that two billion of that authorized issue have been offered by the Secretary of the Treasury and disposed of, leaving three billion of that authorization still undisposed of, which is dealt with in this bill.

The pending bill, as Senators can see by reading it, authorizes the issue of $4,000,000,000 of additional bonds—that is, in addition to the authorization of April 24—at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum, whereas the act of April 24 limited the interest rate to 3½ per cent.

In addition to the $4,000,000,000 authorized by this bill, the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the remaining unissued $3,000,000,000 authorized by the act of April last—the unissued part of the five billions authorized by that act—at the same rate of interest and on the same terms under which the $4,000,000,000 of additional bonds authorized by this act are to be issued.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds of the same character for $63,945,460, being the amount remaining unpaid of the Spanish War loan bonds issued in 1898 and maturing 20 years thereafter, or in 1918. They will fall due during this fiscal year, and must be taken up.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me? Will they be refunded, or is it contemplated that they shall be paid in cash?

Mr. STONE. They are to be paid in cash, but the means for raising the cash to pay them will be from the sale of these bonds. Have I made that clear to the Senator?

Mr. KING. Very.

Mr. STONE. In addition the bill provides that unissued bonds known as Panama Canal bonds, authorized to be issued under the act of August 5, 1909, may be issued under the terms of this bill amounting to $225,000,000.

The bill also provides that $150,000,000 of bonds authorized by joint resolution of March 4, 1917, for naval purposes—that is, for the increase and betterment of the Naval Establishment—may be offered under the provisions of this bill.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to offer the bonds authorized by the act of March 3, 1917, for miscellaneous purposes—that is, for the Alaskan Railroad, for the Mexican situation, for the purchase of the Danish West India Islands, and for one or two other items—making an aggregate of $100,000,000.

That is the extent of the bond issues authorized by this act, the aggregate being $7,538,945,460.

If the last sum just stated—$7,538,945,460—which the bill authorizes to be issued shall be added to the $2,000,000,000 of bonds already offered and sold under the act of April 24 last—widely known as the liberty bonds—it will be seen that the total of bond issues authorized by the two acts—that is, the act of April last and the pending bill—would amount to $9,538,945,460. That, as I understand it, is the total of bond authorization incident to the war up to this date as covered by the laws so far enacted and by this bill.

This bill also would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue what in the bill is denominated "war-savings certificates," redeemable within five years, to the extent of $2,000,000,000. The character of these certificates appears in general terms on the face of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No one to purchase exceeding $1,000.

Mr. STONE. I am obliged to the Senator for this suggestion. No one person can purchase exceeding $1,000 of these war-savings certificates, and not exceeding $100 at one time.

Mr. President, treating these war-savings certificates for the moment as being on a par—which in fact they are not—with bonds—and I do this because they are more or less a permanent indebtedness—and adding this $2,000,000,000 of certificates to the $9,538,945,460 of real bonds authorized under the act of April last and by this bill, the total of what might be called the permanent interest-bearing obligations of the Government up to this date would amount to $11,538,945,460.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue from time to time, in his discretion, what are denominated "certificates of indebtedness," bearing not to exceed 4 per cent interest. It is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the date of issue, the date of payment, and the rate of interest of these certificates.

Mr. KING. They will be called in and paid for out of money derived from the sale of bonds?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From current revenues in the Treasury.

Mr. STONE. These certificates of indebtedness constitute a shifting obligation. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue them merely to meet an emergency, and for the most part in anticipation of revenues that are to come in from the sale of bonds and from taxation, and they are payable out of the funds in the Treasury, whether derived from the one source or the other. The policy is to use them as a bridge to cross an immediate and pressing emergency. Therefore I say they can not well be set down as a part of the standing indebtedness of the Government. If the Secretary of the Treasury should issue a thousand million dollars of them at a given time and should soon thereafter collect from the sale of bonds, for example, or from taxation, sufficient money, he would take them up, and so if the funds came from the sale of bonds the bonds would be substituted for the certificates of indebtedness. The general sum of the public debt would not, therefore, be increased. These certificates of indebtedness are only a sort of convenience to bridge over some immediate emergency.

Mr. President, as I have said, the total bond issues so far authorized under the acts referred to amount to $9,538,945,460.

How are the proceeds of all these issues to be used? Of the proceeds of the sale of these bonds, $7,000,000,000 are primarily intended to establish credits for the entente allies with whom we are cooperating in the war. The remainder of the $9,538,945,460 of bonds is to raise funds with which to meet the current expenses of this Government—this Government; that is to say, out of the $9,538,945,460 the sum of $2,538,945,460 is for our domestic uses.

Mr. President, the estimated expenditures for 1918, for our domestic uses, not including postal receipts, amount to $11,782,370,929. That is the estimate furnished by the Treasury Department up to August 23, 1917. To meet these expenses to which this Government is to be subjected, exclusive of foreign loans as furnished up to August 23 last, the following provisions for raising revenue are made, namely, bonds, $2,475,000,000; war savings certificates, $2,000,000,000; revenue raised by taxation under the pending House bill 4280, $2,406,500,000, being the bill just passed by the Senate and which is now in conference. In addition to that, the present law—the law already in force and under which the Government is operating—provides, outside of postal receipts, for the collection by taxation of $1,333,500,000. Therefore, what is provided for in pending legislation and in the existing law aggregates $8,215,000,000. But, Mr. President, the Treasury estimate of the amount to be raised to meet the current expenses of our own Government for this fiscal year of 1918 is $11,782,370,929. So it follows there must be a shortage or a deficiency of at least $3,567,370,929. The sum which I have last stated is not provided for, and it will be a shortage which must be provided for hereafter. I suppose at the next session in December. How it will be provided for I do not know. It may be by an issue of bonds, or it may be by taxes, or it may be in some divided form between taxes and bonds. That is a question resting in the future, to come before us later.

Mr. President, I close with this statement, which I think is interesting—it should be interesting—to Senators, namely: The domestic revenue—that is, revenue for our own uses, already provided for, as I have shown—is as follows: Bonds and war-savings certificates, $4,475,000,000; taxation under the bill now pending in conference and under previous legislation already enacted, $3,740,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not include postal receipts.

Mr. STONE. No; it does not include postal receipts. So, Mr. President, of the actual collections thus provided for, amounting to $8,215,000,000—$4,475,000,000 bonds and $3,740,000,000 taxes—the percentage by taxation is 45 and the percentage by sale of bonds is 55. I have maintained, and still do, that the burden of this war should be equitably divided between those of us of this generation and those who are to follow us. I think that is the wise economic policy to pursue, and I think so far we have closely approximated that standard in what we have done, as shown in the statement I have submitted. So far, taxation represents 45 per cent and bonds and other securities 55 per cent of the war's financial burden.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. KING. In the suggestion just made by the Senator from Missouri with respect to the proportion of this fund to be provided for by bonds and the proportion to be provided for by taxation, the Senator does not take into account the balance to be provided for as stated in the report of $3,567,370,929.

Mr. STONE. I was just going to speak of that.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, he has now shown, as I understood his figures, that of the expenditure of eight billion and some-odd hundreds of millions of dollars there is a balance to be provided for of $3,567,370,929 even after we have provided from taxation the sum of $2,406,500,000.

Mr. STONE. Let me see if I can make myself clear to the Senator.

Mr. President, the estimated total expenditures for domestic purposes made on August 23 for the current fiscal year were stated at $11,782,370,929; that is the amount we have to raise; and we have provided, by laws already on the statute books and by the revenue bill now in conference, for $8,215,000,000 of the $11,782,000,000 estimated. The difference between these amounts we will have to provide for hereafter. I have no doubt we will have to provide for more than that; but I am now confining myself to the estimates already submitted. So it follows, having provided for $8,215,000,000 out of the $11,782,000,000, we must still provide for the sum of $3,567,370,929, which is the remainder of the present estimates to be hereafter provided for. My statement therefore, of percentages as between taxation and bonds is based wholly upon the amount we have already provided and are now providing shall be raised, not upon what we may have to provide for raising hereafter. Up to date these are the relative proportions—45 per cent taxes and 55 per cent bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STONE. The percentages are as I have stated them—45 per cent taxes and 55 per cent bonds.

Mr. KING. But, if the Senator will pardon me, that means we have got to tax the people to raise over $3,000,000,000 more to meet these current expenses.

Mr. STONE. Oh, yes.

Mr. KING. Or issue bonds to that amount.

Mr. STONE. That we will have to do; but—

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague will remember that I showed in one of the speeches I delivered here on the revenue bill that the proportion to be raised by taxation and the proportion to be raised by the issuance of bonds, if we made all of the appropriations under all of the estimates, would be as follows: By direct taxation, 35.3 per cent; by bonds, 64.7 per cent. Since I made that statement upon the floor of the Senate the Senate struck out what is known as the consumption taxes. So if we take the figures as they are now, with estimated expenditures of $11,782,370,929, and collect by taxation under House bill 4280, the bill now in conference, $2,406,500,000, and collect under present revenue laws $1,333,500,000, and from postal receipts $325,000,000, our total receipts would be $4,065,000,000, which would be 34.5 per cent of all of the appropriations already made and the expenditures which it is estimated will be made during the fiscal year.

Mr. KING. Those figures, if the Senator will pardon me, do not include the loans which have been made and will be made to foreign nations?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly not.

Mr. STONE. That is a different question.

Mr. KING. I assume, if the Senator will pardon me further, that, unless we withhold from those nations to which we make the loans sufficient to meet the interest as it accrues, we will have to meet that indebtedness ourselves.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish I might be permitted to complete this brief statement without having it unduly interspersed with debate.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. STONE. What I have been immediately trying to do is to show the relative proportions raised by taxation and raised by the sale of bonds and war-savings certificates up to a given time; and that time is August 23 last, when these estimates were sent in. Hereafter very large additional estimates may come in, but they are not now here; so that is in some sense conjectural, but a conjecture based on a probability likely to eventuate into a certainty. What I am trying to show now is that up to this time, as far as legislation has gone, of the amount of appropriations of $8,000,000,000 and more in the various bills to which I have referred, 45 per cent is to be raised by taxation and the remainder by the sale of securities.

As to what may come hereafter, that is a problem that we will have to solve when we deal with it; that is a bridge we will have to cross when we reach it. Certainly over three and a half billion dollars of the estimates of August 23 are unprovided for, which will have to be provided for; and I anticipate those estimates will be largely increased when we meet here at the next session; but whatever the estimates may then be, the Congress will have to deal with that subject then and determine how the amount of money we must raise to meet the needs of the Government during the fiscal year shall be provided for. There are but two ways of doing this—one by taxes levied on the people and collected in the usual course of the law, and the other by the sale of bonds or some form of securities. It would be idle for me to say that it lies within the province of the Congress to determine what proportion shall be raised by taxation and what proportion by other methods.

My friend from Utah spoke of the loans to the allies.

I cut that out of my statement as to the relative proportion of taxes to bonds because the $7,000,000,000 authorized to be issued and used to establish credits for foreign Governments will be secured, every dollar of it, by bonds from the respective Governments, bearing the same rate of interest, the form of the bonds and all that to be approved by our Government, and held by our Government.

Mr. President, I assume that these Governments will pay these obligations they give to us. Certainly I can assume and assert that these foreign obligations are received and these credits are established by us on the theory that the foreign Governments will take care of the bonds they give us; that they will pay their interest; and if they do this, the interest on their bonds maturing at the same time that the interest on our bonds mature, the interest accounts from year to year will be taken care of in that way, and afterwards, in the end, the principal of these accommodations will be taken care of by the debtor Governments, and that the United States will suffer no loss on that account.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The mere receipt of the bonds of the allies bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds which are issued by this Government for the purpose of loaning this amount to the allies would not square the account. I should like to ask the Senator what, if any, provision has been made to reimburse the Government of the United States for the considerable amount of money that it costs this Government to print and prepare and sell this large amount of bonds on which it raises the money for the allies?

Mr. STONE. The Senator means, the expense of selling them?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The expense of the transaction.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there is no provision for reimbursement of our expenditures. What we do is to loan these Governments cash, and we raise it in this way, and they send us their securities to indemnify us for the cash we loan them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is very true; and yet we issue these bonds not for our use at all, except in an ultimate and very indirect way. The Senator describes the simple proposition of loaning money to the allies. Now, really, a part of that transaction is the borrowing of the money in the first place ourselves, in order that we may have it to loan to the allies; and we are not made whole in the transaction until the entire cost to the Government of the United States is reimbursed.

I should like to ask the Senator if he knows the amount of money that the transaction will cost the Government of the United States?

Mr. STONE. No; I can not state what it will cost. I do not think anyone can state it. We are making an appropriation in this bill, as the Senator will see, as we did in the bill of April last, of a certain per cent for the sale of these securities. In this bill the House provision provided for one-seventh of 1 per cent for the sale of bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent for the sale of the certificates of indebtedness. The Finance Committee has offered an amendment changing that to one-fourth of 1 per cent for the sale of the bonds and one-twentieth of 1 per cent for the sale of the certificates. Of course that will be an expense fund provided for the Secretary of the Treasury which he can expend at his pleasure. As I recall, it was stated in the committee that the total cost would be something like $23,000,000 for the settlement of this expense account.

Now, I want to say this to the Senator: The department will be at an expense of some millions of dollars—estimated at about $23,000,000. In marketing the $2,000,000,000 of liberty bonds the expense amounted to about—can some Senator tell me the amount of that?

Mr. SMOOT. Two million dollars; one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. STONE. The senior Senator from Utah says that the expense of selling the two billions of liberty bonds already offered was about $2,000,000—one-tenth of 1 per cent. It is said that the expense of selling all of these bonds, the whole seven billions, will be approximately $23,000,000; but then there is an expense in connection with these war-savings certificates and for the negotiation of these certificates of indebtedness, all of which is covered in this estimate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the $23,000,000 covers all of the expense in making the sale of all that we expect to provide for, covering all of the appropriations, and also the sale of the bonds that have not yet been issued, and the certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. STONE. That is what I was trying to say; only the whole of it would not go to the negotiation of the bonds, but a part of it would go to the war-savings certificates and a part of it to the certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator the total amount of our loans to the allies?

Mr. STONE. Mr. McCoy, the expert who sits by me here as a prompter, tells me that he has figured that the cost for negotiating all the loans to the allies would be about $14,500,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Do I understand the Senator correctly to state that we are not to be reimbursed for any part of that by the allies?

Mr. STONE. I think not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I want to say here that while I am heartily in favor of financial assistance to the allies to a most liberal extent, because it is our cause now that we are involved in the war, in these transactions inter-ally between ourselves there is no excuse whatever for the United States Government bearing that expense. The Government ought to be reimbursed for it. It may seem like a comparatively small sum when we are considering the total authorizations of these bills, but we know what we can do with $14,000,000. I should like to have two or three millions of it to develop some irrigation enterprises in the West, and increase the food supply of the country—

Mr. STONE. Well, that is now mere pocket change.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And it should be either provided for altogether outside of the bonds that we receive from the allies, in an independent payment as the expense of the transaction, or else the interest on the bonds which we accept from the allies ought to be increased so as to provide for it in the ultimate payment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just a moment on that point?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far it has cost us something over one-tenth of 1 per cent to dispose of bonds. If we go up to one-fifth or one-fourth, it would then make the cost to the Government of handling the bonds something over $14,000,000 in a $7,000,000,000 transaction.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will say just a word in addition to what the Senator from Georgia has said on this point.

The United States is not generally engaged in the business of loaning money. That is no part of its business. It is making these advances to the allies as a matter of war emergency, as being in aid of the cause upon which this Nation is embarked, in common with the nations we are aiding. There is no need to extend my observations on that particular line, but, Mr. President, I think it is important to add this statement:

This money, these seven billions of dollars that we are raising by the sale of our bonds, is to establish credits for these foreign nations in the United States. The money is to be left here, and it will be expended here. It is not money that is taken from the United States. We do not turn over to them the gold to export to London or to Paris or to Rome. We establish credits here for them, and they draw upon those credits to meet expenditures they incur here in the United States in purchasing materials they need. Now, it is worth very much more than $14,000,000 to the United States to have this money remain here in the way I have just stated instead of sending it abroad as a mere loan to Great Britain or France or Italy. To have this gold exported and put into the vaults of their treasuries would be a serious thing to us, and this Government, I assume, would not do that; for if they did, it might desperately embarrass the financial stability of our Government. So the money is kept here; and I think that that more than compensates for the pittance, so to speak—and it is a pittance when we consider the vast sums involved—the pittance that we are expending to sell the bonds and get the money to establish these credits.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the fact that they spend the money in the United States has no connection whatever with nor does it modify in any way at all the transaction of loaning them the money. They would spend this amount of money in the United States if they obtained the money from their own people instead of from the United States. The reason why they spend it in the United States is because the materials that they want to buy are in the United States. They spent their millions and billions in the United States before we loaned them any money at all for the same reason; and in my judgment that circumstance does not in any way modify the situation between the two parties arising out of this loan. That is what it is. It is a loan of this amount of money by the Government of the United States to these allies; and purely for the sake of that loan, on account of it, and for no other reason, we issue our own bonds at an expense, as the Senator says, of $14,000,000. Now, the Senator from Missouri says that is a mere pittance. That illustrates one of the dangers into which we fall, the danger of extravagance and of false appreciation of the value of money, when we talk about $14,000,000 as being a mere pittance.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question for information. The Senator has referred several times to the securities which the allied countries will give to the United States for the repayment of this loan. Do I understand that they put up any collateral in addition to their own obligations?

Mr. STONE. No.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the Senator's reference to securities, he means their own bonds?

Mr. STONE. I mean their bonds, exactly as provided for in the terms of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have occupied more time than I thought I would. I have been hammering away here for an hour and a little more, when I thought it would not take more than half that time. If agreeable to the Senate, I should like to proceed now to the consideration of the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). The Secretary will proceed to read the bill for action on the amendments of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 2, line 1, after the words "United States," to insert "in addition to the $2,000,000,000 bonds already issued or offered for subscription under authority of the act approved April 24, 1917, entitled 'An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes,'" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States for the purposes of this act, and to meet expenditures authorized for the national security and defense and other public purposes authorized by law, not exceeding in the aggregate $7,538,945,460, and to issue therefor bonds of the United States, in addition to the $2,000,000,000 bonds already issued or offered for subscription under authority of the act approved April 24, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri permit me to make an inquiry here? I presume it is the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury to call in the two billions of bonds heretofore issued under the act of April 24, 1917, and to issue new bonds, bearing an increased rate of interest.

Mr. STONE. They can be converted into bonds at a higher rate of interest. If the Senator will turn to the section of the act—

Mr. KING. As I understand the situation, under the act of April, 1917, the bonds that were issued could be converted, and if there was a subsequent issue of bonds the issue would be subject of course to the terms of that issue; and this bill merely perpetuates that provision.

Mr. STONE. It perpetuates the right given by that act. I was looking for the provision in the act of April 24, but it is in substance what the Senator has said.

Mr. KING. I have had no opportunity to read the bill except since the Senator from Missouri began discussing it.

Mr. STONE. The Government does not call in the $2,000,000,000 of 3½ per cent bonds issued under the act of April 24, but they are entitled to be converted at the option of the holders into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest.

Mr. KING. While I am on my feet, although it is not germane to the matter to which I just invited the Senator's attention, I should like to ask him why it was that the Government did not in some other way take care of the $150,000,000 referred to in the report as bonds authorized by the joint resolution of March 4, 1917, for naval purposes? In other words, why was not that amount carried in the appropriation bill and treated as other expenditures are treated for war and naval purposes, transferring it from the bond column to the war-expense column, if those terms may be properly employed to distinguish the matter?

Mr. STONE. The bonds have not been sold to get the money to meet the appropriation, and it has been thought wise since we were issuing these bonds under this act to have them all issued under the same terms, because there might be found difficulty in sending out different kinds of bonds when offering the bonds provided for in this bill to have different denominations with different dates of maturity and different rates of interest. The idea was to consolidate them.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, in view of the fact that those bonds have not been issued, it occurs to me the wiser and better way of handling the subject, in view of the fact that an appropriation bill will, I understand, soon come before us, would have been to make an appropriation of $150,000,000 to be met by taxation.

Mr. STONE. I think it has been appropriated for.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has been appropriated.

Mr. KING. And then treat it as a part of the expenditures of the Government, and not issue any bonds under this provision, but repeal that provision of the act which authorizes the issuance of $150,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And meet it by taxation.

Mr. KING. And meet it by taxation instead of by a bond issue.

Mr. STONE. That would be one way of doing it, but the proposal here is to issue bonds so as to meet the appropriation. It was intended when the $150,000,000 was first authorized in the joint resolution that the appropriation should be met by the sale of bonds, and that idea is contained here.

Mr. KING. This is not the proper occasion to make the observation, but it seems to me that it would have been the part of wisdom and a wiser financial policy to have treated that item as well as one or two other items referred to in the bill and the report submitted by the committee in a different manner and to have provided to meet them by taxation instead of by bond issues.

Mr. BRADY rose.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to ask me a question?

Mr. BRADY. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether or not the $2,000,000,000 of bonds that have already been issued must be exchanged and called in, or whether the parties holding the bonds simply have the privilege of exchanging them?

Mr. STONE. I have just stated that they are not to be called in, but they may be converted into these 4 per cent bonds, or any other future issue of bonds, at a higher rate of interest at the option of the holder.

Mr. BRADY. It is at the option of the holder whether he exchanges for new bonds or retains the old bonds?

Mr. STONE. He can exchange them as they mature, if he wishes it, or he can exchange for new bonds of a later period.

Mr. BRADY. That was the information I desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 1, page 2, line 10, before the word "bonds," to insert "unissued"; in line 13, before the word "bonds," to insert "unissued"; in line 16, before the word "bonds," to insert "unissued"; and in line 18, before the word "bonds," to insert "unissued," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That of this sum $3,063,945,460 shall be in lieu of that amount of the unissued bonds authorized by sections 1 and 4 of the act approved April 24, 1917, $225,000,000 shall be in lieu of that amount of the unissued bonds authorized by section 39 of the act approved August 5, 1909, $150,000,000 shall be in lieu of the unissued bonds authorized by the joint resolution approved March 4, 1917, and $100,000,000 shall be in lieu of the unissued bonds authorized by section 400 of the act approved March 3, 1917.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to inquire if the bill is now being considered for committee amendments, and if after the committee amendments have been disposed of the bill will then be open in all its sections and parts for such amendments as individual Senators may choose to offer?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had no doubt that was the understanding, but I wanted to be sure of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the order of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By unanimous consent, the formal reading of the bill was dispensed with and the amendments of the committee were to be considered as reached.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was called off the floor just at the time consent was given, and I wanted to be quite sure.

Mr. BRADY. The bill will then be perfected as far as committee amendments are concerned, and it will then be open to any amendment any Senator may desire to offer.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, and read the next paragraph, as follows:

The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form or forms and denomination or denominations and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate or rates of interest, not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and time or times of payment of interest as the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time at or before the issue thereof may prescribe. The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia, who has charge of the bill now, whether there was any consideration given to the exact phraseology here? It seems to me that it is inaccurate. The bankers always used, when agitation was on as to payable in gold, to say, "Payable in gold coin of the United States of the present weight and fineness." That is actually correct. There is no such thing as a standard of value of gold or anything else, because gold, measured in everything else in the world, varies from day to day, and particularly has it varied in the last year or two. I presume that language was suggested by the Treasury Department, was it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know that that particular language was the subject of consideration; at least, it was not in my presence.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not desire to move an amendment, but it does seem to me that the accurate language would be "gold coin of the present weight and fineness" instead of "value," because value is a relative thing which changes continually. However, I have no amendment to offer.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 4, line 11, after the word "act," to insert "or of such act approved April 24, 1917," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to establish credits with the United States for any foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States; and, to the extent of the credits so established from time to time, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase, at par, from such foreign governments respectively their several obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act, or of such act approved April 24, 1917, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine, or to make advances to or for the account of any such foreign governments and to receive such obligations at par for the amount of any such advances; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, and any such obligations shall contain such provisions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine for the conversion of any such obligations into obligations bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds of the United States issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, but the rate of interest in such foreign obligations shall not be less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to enter into such arrangements from time to time with any such foreign governments as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for the payment of such obligations of foreign governments before maturity.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 6, line 15, after the word "prescribe," to insert "but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, from time to time, to exercise in respect to any obligation of foreign governments acquired under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, any privilege of conversion into obligations bearing interest at a higher rate provided for in or pursuant to this act or said act approved April 24, 1917, and to convert any short-time obligations of foreign governments which may have been purchased under the authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, into long-time obligations of such foreign governments, respectively, maturing not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, as the case may be, and in such form and terms as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act; and under such terms and conditions as he may from time to time prescribe, etc.

Mr. STONE. Let that amendment be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 2, after the word "obligations," to strike out "at not" and insert "(but not at"; and in line 3, after the word "interest," to insert "unless otherwise hereafter provided by law)," so as to read:

and, under such terms and conditions as he may from time to time prescribe, to receive payment, on or before maturity, of any obligations of such foreign governments acquired on behalf of the United States under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, and, with the approval of the President, to sell any of such obligations (but not at less than the purchase price with accrued interest unless otherwise hereafter provided by law), and to apply the proceeds thereof, and any payments so received from foreign governments on account of the principal of their said obligations, to the redemption or purchase, at not more than par and accrued interest, of any bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917; and if such bonds can not be so redeemed or purchased the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem or purchase any other outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States which may at such time be subject to redemption or which can be purchased at not more than par and accrued interest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 22, after the words "and in," to insert "offering for subscription"; on page 8, line 7, after the words "German Government," to strike out, in parentheses, the words "(the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States)"; and in line 16, after the word "prescribed," to strike out "The bonds to be issued upon such conversion shall be in such form or forms, and subject to such terms and conditions of redemption, conversion, and maturity of principal, and of interest, and otherwise, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe in or pursuant to the convertible bonds, and such bonds shall be issued from time to time if and when and to the extent that the privilege of conversion so conferred shall arise and shall be exercised," and insert: "The bonds to be issued upon such conversion under this act shall be substantially the same in form and terms as shall be prescribed by or pursuant to law with respect to the bonds of such subsequent series, not only as to interest rate but also as to convertibility (if future bonds be issued at a still higher rate of interest) or nonconvertibility, and as to exemption from taxation, if any, and in all other respects, except that the bonds issued upon such conversion shall have the same dates of maturity, of principal, and of interest, and be subject to the same terms of redemption before maturity, as the bonds converted; and such bonds shall be issued from time to time if and when and to the extent that the privilege of conversion so conferred shall arise and shall be exercised. If the privilege of conversion so conferred under this act shall once arise, and shall not be exercised with respect to any convertible bonds within the period so prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, then such privilege shall terminate as to such bonds and shall not arise again though again thereafter bonds be issued bearing interest at a higher rate or rates," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That in connection with the issue of any series of bonds under the authority of section 1 of this act the Secretary of the Treasury may determine that the bonds of such series shall be convertible as provided in or pursuant to this section, and, in any such case, he may make appropriate provision to that end in offering for subscription the bonds of such series (hereinafter called convertible bonds). In any case of the issue of a series of convertible bonds, if a subsequent series of bonds (not including United States certificates of indebtedness, war savings certificates, and other obligations maturing not more than five years from the issue of such obligations, respectively) bearing interest at a higher rate shall, under the authority of this or any other act, be issued by the United States before the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, then the holders of such convertible bonds shall have the privilege, at the option of the several holders, at any time within such period, after the public offering of bonds of such subsequent series, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall have prescribed, of converting their bonds, at par, into bonds bearing such higher rate of interest at such price not less than par as the Secretary of the Treasury shall have prescribed. The bonds to be issued upon such conversion under this act shall be substantially the same in form and terms as shall be prescribed by or pursuant to law with respect to the bonds of such subsequent series, not only as to interest rate but also as to convertibility (if future bonds be issued at a still higher rate of interest) or nonconvertibility, and as to exemption from taxation, if any, and in all other respects, except that the bonds issued upon such conversion shall have the same dates of maturity, of principal, and of interest, and be subject to the same terms of redemption before maturity as the bonds converted; and such bonds shall be issued from time to time if and when and to the extent that the privilege of conversion so conferred shall arise and shall be exercised. If the privilege of conversion so conferred under this act shall once arise, and shall not be exercised with respect to any convertible bonds within the period so prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, then such privilege shall terminate as to such bonds and shall not arise again though again thereafter bonds be issued bearing interest at a higher rate or rates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 12, line 4, before the word "interest," to strike out "For the purpose of this act the" and insert "The," so as to make the section read:

Sec. 7. That none of the bonds authorized by section 1, nor of the certificates authorized by section 5, or by section 6, of this act, shall bear the circulation privilege. All such bonds and certificates shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations. The interest on an amount of such bonds and certificates the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, shall be exempt from the taxes provided for in subdivision (b) of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 8.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question relative to section 9, on page 13.

Mr. STONE. Let the section be first read, Mr. President.

Mr. BRADY. Very well; let the section be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section will be read.

The Secretary read section 9, as follows:

Sec. 9. That in connection with the operations of advertising, selling, and delivering any bonds, certificates of indebtedness, or war-savings certificates of the United States provided for in this act, the Postmaster General, under such regulations as he may prescribe, shall require, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, the employees of the Post Office Department and of the Postal Service to perform such services as may be necessary, desirable, or practicable, without extra compensation.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, this section proposes to give a rather unusual authority to the Postmaster General, and it will bring into the service of the United States for the purpose of disposing of these bonds a very large force of men. I am wondering if that will not materially reduce the cost of selling the bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the question of authorizing, under regulations to be made by the Postmaster General, the selling of bonds and the receiving of moneys for the sale of these bonds by the postmasters, will, of course, lessen the cost of the sale and distribution of the bonds. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that, in fixing the amount of expenses provided for, that matter has been taken into consideration. Further, it will only happen in sales of bonds of small denominations and of the war-savings bonds. It may happen in other instances, however; but in order that these war-savings bonds may be distributed throughout the country as widely as possible—and they will be in small denominations—some way had to be provided to sell the same to the purchaser with as little expense as possible. Under this provision, all that any person would have to do would be to go to a post office, subscribe for, say, a $5 war-savings bond, or a $10 one, or any other amount not to exceed $1,000, and the postmaster can sell it to him and deliver it to him, and receive the money in exchange for it.

Mr. BRADY. This section places at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Postmaster General, all the employees of the Post Office Department and of the Postal Service in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. BRADY. Can the Senator from Utah indicate about how many employees that would mean who would assist in the disposition of these bonds?

Mr. STONE. It would be all of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I should think there would be 40,000 or more.

Mr. BRADY. And the committee took that matter into consideration in figuring the cost of the sale of the bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. It did.

Mr. BRADY. And the committee feels that it would require one-fourth of 1 per cent to dispose of the bonds, including the services of these 40,000 employees?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I will say to the Senator that in some foreign countries it has taken a great deal more than that, especially in the later sales of bonds. It would not have taken that much, and it did not take that much, for the first sale of bonds in the United States, but this legislation covers what will no doubt be three campaigns for the sale of bonds and certificates. We are now providing for that; and I am sure the Senator from Idaho will agree with me that after every campaign which passes the next campaign will be a little more expensive, and it will be a little harder to secure subscriptions for the bonds. The amount which we provide for here is to cover the sale of all of the bonds and all of the short-time and war-savings certificates that it is intended to issue during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. BRADY. Referring to the one-fourth of 1 per cent for the selling of the bonds, if I read this bill correctly, it provides for one-fourth of 1 per cent on this entire $7,000,000,000 of bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. No matter what the amount of bonds may be, still if it is $7,000,000,000 it is one-fourth of 1 per cent on $7,000,000,000. If hereafter we provide for additional bonds, of course we shall have to provide for the same amount for advertising and selling of those bonds. But there is provided in the bill one-fourth of 1 per cent upon the sale of the bonds and one-twentieth of 1 per cent on the short-time certificates.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, supplementing what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has very clearly said, which I think ought to be satisfactory to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], I will read an extract from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury which was made before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives:

The cooperation of the Postmaster General and of the Post Office Department will be enlisted in connection with the financing of the war, particularly in the campaign for the sale of war-savings certificates, as the Post Office provides the United States with a representative in every community, whose services should be availed of in this connection. Similarly the assistance of numerous committees, agencies, and special assistants must be availed of in connection with the operations under the proposed act.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I do not want to be understood as in any way antagonizing the issuance of these bonds or unduly criticizing the action of the committee. My only thought in making these suggestions is that it seems to me we have really provided an excessive amount for the sale of the bonds.

Mr. STONE. I will suggest to the Senator that we will come to that a little bit later.

Mr. BRADY. If I am mistaken in that, I am ready to be convinced. I desire in every way possible to assist, not only in the passage of this bill, but in the sale of the bonds at a reasonable cost.

Mr. STONE. I am sure of that; but the Senator is not discussing the particular clause of the bill relating to that, but he is discussing another question.

Mr. BRADY. But it has a bearing on that clause.

Mr. STONE. It does in a sense have a bearing upon it; but I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that these war certificates—as no doubt he is well advised, being a very diligent and industrious Senator, and therefore has read the bill—are issued in a way through the Post Office Department. The postmasters sell the stamps to the people who desire to make investments of that kind, and it is entirely proper, it seems to me—I can not see how there can be any objection to it—to invoke the aid of all the postmasters and other people in furthering that project.

Mr. BRADY. It is a splendid thought, and good business; but I have been wondering, if availing ourselves of the services of these 40,000 employees might not enable us to reduce the amount we are providing to pay in this bill for negotiating the bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it is expected to distribute the war-savings bonds in denominations perhaps as low as $5. England does the same thing; she has bonds of as low denomination as £1, which is equal to our $5.

The Senator from Idaho knows that in order to get that kind of a bond engraved and ready for distribution, then to find a purchaser, and to provide that the money is to be paid in installments—because that is what we are going to provide under the regulations of the Treasury Department—it would be absolutely impossible to hire people to do the work necessary, for it would take nearly all, if not all, of what would be received from the sale of the bonds to pay for performing the work. So it is proposed to take this means of having that class of bonds sold to the people.

Mr. BRADY. I am not discussing at all the question of the warrants on savings certificates; I am talking merely of bond issues and the one-fourth of 1 per cent. I think one-twentieth of 1 per cent on the amount of the certificates in selling them is very reasonable. The only question I am raising is as to one-fourth of 1 per cent for the selling of the regular bonds. However, I will say nothing further on the subject at the moment, but when we come to that clause I desire to discuss the matter more at length, for I think we should thoroughly understand it at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I shall not say anything further about it now.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 10, page 13, line 22, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "one-seventh" and to insert "one-fourth," so as to read:

Sec. 10. That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act, except under section 12, a sum not exceeding one-fourth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and war-savings certificates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will wait to see if there is any objection.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, at this point I want to discuss the amendment, and if it is the proper place to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. STONE. I do not know exactly what the Senator from Idaho has in mind, but he said a moment ago that when we reached the point we have now reached, he desired to make some observations.

Mr. BRADY. On line 23, page 13, where the committee propose to insert "one-fourth of 1 per cent," at the proper time I desire to offer an amendment. Is it proposed that we shall perfect the bill now? Shall I offer my amendment afterward or shall I offer it at this time, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had announced that the amendment was agreed to without objection. The Chair waited and heard no objection.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the agreement to the committee amendment may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment of the committee was agreed to is reconsidered. The amendment is now open for amendment or for discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would withhold his amendment for a moment, in order that I may make a brief statement.

Mr. BRADY. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the act of April, 1916, allowed one-tenth of 1 per cent for the expenses for the sale of liberty bonds. It developed that one-tenth of 1 per cent was not enough to pay the expenses if all the work had not been donated, although that was the first issue of bonds and the effort was made to make it popular with the people. There was not a single dollar paid for advertising purposes in newspapers, magazines, farm journals, and other publications for the purpose of selling those bonds. The services of the press in that respect were given voluntarily. When, however, we stop to think that every billion dollars of bonds issued requires 4,000,000 engraved bonds, each one of which costs upon an average from 14 to 15 cents, and when we stop to consider the expense to which the Government will be put in order to place the next $4,000,000,000 loan, I am quite sure that there must be provided for expenses in connection with the sale of the bonds the amount provided by the Senate committee.

Mr. STONE. It is proposed to issue more than $4,000,000,000 of those securities.

Mr. SMOOT. I will explain what I mean by using the phrase "the next $4,000,000,000 loan." I do not think the Secretary of the Treasury at any one time will undertake to sell more than $4,000,000,000 worth of Government obligations. The amount that we will have to raise for the year no doubt will be offered in three or four campaigns. It is absolutely necessary that that course be followed, because it would upset trade in the United States if we undertook to shift credits to the amount of, say, $8,000,000,000 at one time. We must take into consideration the fact that whenever one campaign closes and another campaign is undertaken, the preliminary expenses attaching to the first campaign must be again incurred.

Mr. BRADY. What is the necessity for having so many campaigns?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we are compelled on account of business conditions to provide for successive campaigns. We can not take $11,000,000,000 out of the regular channels of trade and transfer that amount from one section of the country to another without upsetting business in the country; it can not be done.

Mr. BRADY. How many bonds did we place in the first issue?

Mr. SMOOT. We placed $2,000,000,000 of liberty-loan bonds, and we sold short-time certificates to cover loans to foreign countries to the amount of something over $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BRADY. How much was the $2,000,000,000 bond offering oversubscribed?

Mr. SMOOT. In the first campaign, Mr. President, the bonds were oversubscribed by something like 50 or 60 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. That would mean that applications were received for $4,000,000,000 of bonds at the time $2,000,000,000 were asked for.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not for $4,000,000,000, but three billion and some odd-hundred million dollars. I have not the exact figures before me at the moment, but the subscriptions amounted to over $3,000,000,000. I will say to the Senator that the great proportion, not of the number of subscribers, but of the money subscribed came from the money centers of the country, from the banks. It is very doubtful whether the banks can make such an investment in the second, the third, or the fourth campaign as they did in the first; in fact, I know the Western banks can not do so. I know that they took from their capital, in purchasing the first issue of bonds, all that they could possibly take and remain on the safe side. Therefore every effort must be made to see that the bonds to be issued under this bill shall be distributed, if possible, in every home in the country. England not only has short-time certificates and war-savings bonds, but she provides five different characters of Government obligations for sale in small denominations.

Mr. KING. And Germany issues securities in small denominations also in order to popularize her loans.

Mr. SMOOT. As the campaigns succeed one another it will become increasingly harder to sell the bonds or the certificates of indebtedness. That has been the experience of foreign countries and it will be our experience.

Mr. President, on September 13 the Secretary of the Treasury addressed a letter to the Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE, acting chairman of the Finance Committee, United States Senate, in which he makes this statement in relation to the cost of the sale of bonds:

In view of the very limited appropriation carried by the act of April 24, it was necessary for me to limit the amount allotted to each Federal reserve bank for the expenses in its district and to require the banks to make their calculations on that limited basis. The Federal reserve banks, however, in view of this limited allotment were compelled to seek voluntary services. For instance, the Federal reserve bank of New York was required to have two or three hundred men in its clerical force and there was no adequate means of paying for such a force. The situation was met by banks and investment houses patriotically donating the services of their own clerks and employees for the period of the campaign. These men entered the service of the Federal reserve bank and the liberty-loan committees at the expense of their employers. In my judgment the repetition of this should not be thought of. The bankers will, of course, gladly give their own services again, but they should not be asked to pay the salaries of their clerks and employees who are engaged in the Government service. Aside from the fact that to do that is neither fair nor right, it is not conducive to the greatest efficiency because it is impossible for the Federal reserve banks to build up thoroughly effective organizations if in large measure they are limited to the services of volunteers during the period of the greatest pressure.

The banks of this country distributed millions of circulars.

Mr. BRADY. Will they not do so again?

Mr. SMOOT. I presume they will do so again; I have no reason to doubt that they will; but the banks of this country, Mr. President, paid even the postage upon the circulars. The Senator may ask, "Well, will they not do it again?"

Mr. BRADY. They will be just as loyal in the future as they have been in the past.

Mr. SMOOT. I think perhaps they will; but the Secretary of the Treasury feels that it will be impossible to bring about the efficiency necessary to secure sale of these bonds in the future unless he is given sufficient money to perfect an organization which he can absolutely control.

Mr. BRADY. I am perfectly willing to give the Secretary of the Treasury any organization which he may need for the selling of these bonds; but I do not want to create a great fund that will be spent extravagantly or unnecessarily. If we hold the amount down to a reasonable and proper limit, it will be spent more judiciously than if we place a great fund at the command of the Secretary of the Treasury—for certainly he can not have the time to oversee all of these details—but in the hands of men who have had no more business experience than the bankers of this country.

Mr. SMOOT. I am in sympathy, Mr. President, with what the Senator has just said; but I must call his attention to the fact that it would be disastrous to our country if we undertook to sell $4,000,000,000 of bonds at this time, when all of the allies are depending upon us for assistance, and should fail in the sale of the same.

Mr. BRADY. It would certainly be a great disaster in itself; but it is one that I never expect to see in America.

Mr. SMOOT. It would not only be a disaster to our own cause and to our own country, but it would have a depressing effect upon the other nations engaged in the war with us.

Mr. STONE. We will have to place more than $4,000,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. I have stated what the result would be even in case a $4,000,000,000 issue should fail.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to ask him a question, I observe that the committee of the House placed the amount at a sum not exceeding one-seventh of 1 per cent per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. They had facilities for securing information, did they not, and does the Senator not think that they gave the matter careful and serious consideration? Does he not believe that when they wrote "one-seventh of 1 per cent" in the bill they did it after very thorough and complete investigation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And when we wrote "one-fourth of 1 per cent" we did the same.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that the House committee considered the question of expense when they provided a fund of one-seventh of 1 per cent for the selling of the bonds, and I think that they gave equal consideration, perhaps, when they provided one-tenth of 1 per cent for the sale of the short-time certificates. The Senator will notice that the Committee on Finance of the Senate has changed that "one-tenth" to "one-twentieth." I frankly say to the Senator that it is not going to cost one-twentieth of 1 per cent or anything like that amount to place the short-time certificates. Such certificates are placed generally with the banks. The most that is required is for the Secretary of the Treasury to go to Chicago or to New York or write a letter asking the banks to take, say, $200,000,000 of these certificates, payable in four months or six months, as the case may be, and they are sold. It costs very little to do that. The House provided that the percentages allowed for the expense of selling the different kinds of securities should not be interchangeable; or, in other words, if one-tenth of 1 per cent provided for in the House bill for the sale of short-time certificates should be twice or three times or four times what was needed, that balance unexpended could not be used for the sale of bonds or for the sale of other certificates provided for in the bill. Your committee has stricken out that provision; we have amended the bill by making the allowance for the sale of certificates one-twentieth of 1 per cent, instead of one-tenth of 1 per cent, and making the allowance for the sale of bonds one-fourth of 1 per cent, instead of one-seventh of 1 per cent.

I wish to say to the Senator that if it does not take one-fourth of 1 per cent to cover the expense in connection with the sale of the bonds, the money will not be taken from the Treasury of the United States; but, so far as your committee are concerned, they did not want to run the risk of having the Secretary of the Treasury in the midst of a campaign, whether it be the second or the third one, fall short of sufficient money in order to make the bond issue a success.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I understand from what the Senator says—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Idaho will yield to me for a moment, I think perhaps that the attention of the Senate should be called to the fact that as this bill was prepared by the Treasury Department and submitted to the House it provided for one-fifth of 1 per cent as the amount that would be sufficient to carry on and conduct the campaign which the Secretary of the Treasury contemplated in order to bring about the sale of the bonds, and one-tenth of 1 per cent for the creation of a fund out of which to negotiate the sale of the Treasury certificates.

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and presented his argument for the allowance of the rates stated—that is, one-tenth of 1 per cent for negotiating the Treasury certificates and one-fifth of 1 per cent for providing a fund sufficient to carry on the campaign to sell the bonds. The Ways and Means Committee cut down the Treasury estimate of the amount required to negotiate the sale of the bonds from one-fifth to one-seventh. When the bill came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Finance the Secretary appeared before the Committee on Finance, and I am sure I state the import of what he said when I say that he urged upon the Committee on Finance the advisability of giving to him the rate per cent which he had recommended in the bill as prepared and submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House.

Mr. President, I think it is fair that the Senate should understand that at no time in the hearings before the Senate committee did the Secretary of the Treasury ever suggest the increase of the amount to one-fourth of 1 per cent. He did say, in response to interrogatories propounded to him, that one-fifth of 1 per cent would enable him to conduct such a campaign as he had conducted for the sale of the two billions of bonds, at which time, outside of the ordinary methods employed, there had been quite a large amount of circularization, printing of advertisements to be hung up in various places where they would receive the attention of the public; bill-board advertising, street-car advertising, and window advertising; and the Secretary of the Treasury did say that he could conduct a like campaign if he were given one-fifth of 1 per cent.

There has been some talk about the Capitol of inaugurating in the next bond sale what is known as a newspaper-advertising campaign; and the Committee on Finance was appealed to by the representative of a large number of newspapers, who was here for the purpose of securing a large appropriation for conducting a paid newspaper-advertising campaign that would run into the millions. He sought a hearing before the Committee on Finance. That was denied, and there was some discussion in the committee as to the propriety of having any such advertising campaign conducted by the newspapers. The Secretary of the Treasury stated to the committee that he had not yet become convinced either as to the wisdom of the policy or as to the necessity of entering upon a widespread newspaper-advertising campaign.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator to pardon me for just a moment. While he said, Mr. President, that it might be found desirable or necessary to pay the newspapers for advertising the sale of the next bond issue he was not himself convinced that such a policy would be either wise or necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Please let me proceed for a moment, if I am not trespassing too much upon the time of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. Not at all. I shall be glad to have the Senator conclude his statement.

Mr. POMERENE. I will not interrupt just now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the Secretary of the Treasury did say, in response to a question I asked him—in the course of stating the question I said that I did not believe it was wise public policy to enter upon a general newspaper-advertising scheme for the sale of these bonds—that while he had not made up his mind that such a campaign would be wise, one-fifth of 1 per cent would enable him to pay the expenses of the campaign which he contemplated making, and to use some newspaper advertising if he should find that it was necessary, but not to conduct a widespread general newspaper advertising for the sale of these bonds. He said, furthermore, that he believed that if such a policy were entered upon at all every newspaper in the United States ought to be given advertising; there ought not to be any discrimination.

Senators can readily see the reason for that without my going into it. The distribution of two or three million dollars among the newspapers of this country by an administrative officer raises questions of a grave character, unless by the terms of the law there is no discretion invested in the administrative officer as to where these favors are to be bestowed.

Mr. President, in the committee I took the position, and I take it here, that for the bond issue provided here I think the Secretary of the Treasury should be provided with all of the means required for the conduct of the campaign, as it is called, for negotiating the sale of these bonds, outside of entering upon this plan of—I will not say subsidizing—but this plan of nationwide newspaper advertising.

Furthermore, there is just one more thought, and then I will yield the floor back to the Senator from Idaho again, with my apologies for having kept it so long.

Mr. BRADY. I have no objection at all to the Senator proceeding.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is this: I put this proposition to the Secretary—that as Congress, even if it adjourned, would meet again in December, and as the Secretary stated, in response to a question propounded to him by me, that but one campaign could be prosecuted for the sale of bonds between now and December, if the amount which he had first determined upon as ample for taking care of the negotiation of these bonds, to wit, one-fifth of 1 per cent, proved for any reason to be insufficient, he would have plenty of time at the convening of Congress in December to ask an additional appropriation. Notwithstanding this testimony presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, the committee, upon a divided vote, wrote into this bill one-fourth of 1 per cent instead of one-fifth of 1 per cent as the amount that should be allowed for negotiating the sale of these bonds and carrying forward the campaign.

Mr. BRADY. And I understand from the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin that the Committee on Finance had no direct statement from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending one-fourth of 1 per cent instead of one-fifth of 1 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true, Mr. President. In his hearing before the committee the Secretary of the Treasury at no time mentioned a figure higher than one-fifth of 1 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I notice in a statement that has been issued, quoting from the Secretary of the Treasury, that the Secretary says:

I think any investment banker will say that to sell a great mass of securities requiring an intensive campaign like these Government issues require at a cost of not exceeding one-fifth of 1 per cent is a very large achievement.

In other words, he seems here to have based his statement upon the recommendation of one-fifth of 1 per cent; but since the committee have considered this matter, and have decided that they feel that it should be one-fourth of 1 per cent, I am not going at this time to raise objections to that particular amount. I do believe, however, that a part of this amount should be spent for newspaper advertising, and I am now going to offer an amendment along those lines.

The Secretary of the Treasury said before the Finance Committee:

I have felt all along, I am perfectly frank to say, that if the Government entered upon a campaign of advertising in the newspapers it ought to pay for it at reasonable rates, because the only commodity the newspapers have is advertising, and we ought not to ask them to give it for nothing any more than to ask the steel mills to give their product for nothing or the farmers to give their produce to the Government for the purposes of the war. We did not enter upon a paid campaign of advertising. Everything of that sort was done by voluntary subscription and voluntary effort.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask whose statement it is that the Senator is reading?

Mr. BRADY. It is the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Continuing, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

It is impossible for me to make any sort of accurate estimate of the total amount of money contributed by volunteers and spent by them in the efforts they made to sell liberty bonds in the different cities throughout the country. It was a very large sum, and without it this issue could not have been made successful.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask whether there is any reference made in that statement to the fact that these newspapers and magazines are carried by the Government at 1 cent a pound, when it costs the Government 8 cents a pound?

Mr. BRADY. I did not discover anything of that character in the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. On the other hand, I am not discussing at this time the postal laws. I am endeavoring to have this issue of bonds properly advertised, and sold under proper business methods.

I notice, in quoting here from another party whose name I do not have, that in speaking of the estimate of the cost of the bonds he says:

Those who have carefully studied the liberty-bond advertising compute that $5,000,000 in advertising was gratuitously contributed.

If that be true, I presume that our newspaper friends paid back that much to the Government on this hauling of the mail.

Mr. President, I desire at this time to offer an amendment. I am not going to discuss it at length, for I think the Senate will know whether or not it feels that it should be adopted; but I at least want to have the newspapers of our country properly recognized and paid for what work they do on a reasonable basis.

I therefore move to insert, after the word "certificates," on page 13, line 24, the following:

Provided, That one-fourth of the one-fourth of 1 per cent herein provided shall be used under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for purchasing space in the newspapers and other periodicals of the United States for the purpose of advertising the bonds authorized under this act.

Mr. POMERENE. What portion of this fund does the amendment provide shall be spent in this way?

Mr. BRADY. One-fourth of the one-fourth of 1 per cent. That will make one-sixteenth of 1 per cent of the amount that we have authorized to be used for the sale of these bonds.

The Secretary of the Treasury is going to use newspaper space in advertising, and we might as well have it done under our authority and direction as to have him do it voluntarily, for he certainly says in his statement that that is what he is going to do. If that be so, I want to say further that I also fully agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that this money should be used fairly and equitably in all the papers, without regard to their political affiliations or their influence in the political world; and if there can be any safeguard of that kind thrown around this matter I should be only too glad to have it done, and I know that the newspapers of this country feel the same way.

Let me say just one word relative to this amendment, and then I am ready to have it submitted to a vote.

We are authorizing the payment of one-fourth of 1 per cent for the selling of these bonds. We are authorizing it on the entire $7,000,000,000, and we have already marketed $2,000,000,000 of bonds, with an oversubscription of over a billion dollars. That being the case, it demonstrates that we have marketed these bonds for less than one-fifth of 1 per cent. In my judgment, the bankers of this country would feel that they had received a good commission if they could receive one-fourth of 1 per cent for marketing $7,000,000,000 of bonds. In addition to that, what do we have? We have every banker in the United States giving his services free, and, as the Senator from Utah says, using his own stationery and paying his own postage. In addition to that we have 40,000 postmasters and postal clerks and assistants doing their work free of charge. Never in the history of this world has there been the amount of work contributed free of charge that has been contributed in the selling of our last issue of bonds and that will be contributed in the selling of this issue of bonds.

We have, therefore, that much help without cost to the Government. Let us, through the medium of the newspapers, get this knowledge of the sale of these bonds and the advantage of buying small amounts diffused out through the entire country. I can not think that the Secretary of the Treasury, after this specific authorization, would use that for political purposes; and if he does not use it for political purposes he will give every paper in the country an equal opportunity, even if it is only a very small advertisement. Every paper in this country during the sale of the last issue of bonds contributed space free of charge, wrote editorials favoring the bonds in every way possible, gave space, many of them, for advertising without a cent of remuneration; and why not let us, if we are going to spend one-fourth of 1 per cent, spend one-fourth of that amount for advertising in the newspapers? It will make a smaller amount than $5,000,000, and it will be distributed fairly throughout all the United States; and it seems to me that it is only just and fair that we should sell these bonds in accordance with regular business methods. If any banker or trust company or large concern were going to sell these bonds, they would not hesitate a moment to use the space in the newspapers for advertising purposes. Then why should not the Government do the same?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Senator from Ohio begins his remarks, the Chair wishes to state that the question now before the Senate is the committee amendment. Is there any objection to considering the amendment of the Senator from Idaho at this time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho is an amendment to the committee amendment, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Chair will say to the Senator that it is not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, of course, it would be out of order at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is out of order unless unanimous consent is granted to have it considered at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing, while we are considering this committee amendment, to dispose of the newspaper-publication proposition at the same time; and I shall make no point of order on the amendment now offered by the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am somewhat surprised at this amendment offered by my very good friend from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Some weeks ago the Treasury Department entered upon a campaign to sell $2,000,000,000 worth of these bonds. There was an organization in every community. The great American people believed that this was their bond sale in behalf of America and in behalf of humanity. There was an organization in every community composed of business men, professional men, brave, patriotic, liberty-loving women and children, every one of them volunteering their time, their talents, their money to further the sale of this bond issue. Instead of getting subscriptions for $2,000,000,000 the American people subscribed for over $3,000,000,000.

My good friend from Idaho refers to the fact that the advertising columns of the newspapers were given for this purpose. Of all the volunteered effort on behalf of this bond issue, the only class of men that has come and asked for money, the only class that is favored by the Senator's amendment, is the publisher's lobby that has been frequenting the Marble Room here for weeks in behalf of this very piece of legislation in its own behalf.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. For fear that some one might gain the impression that I have been lobbied with, I want to say to the Senator that I have not, directly or indirectly, discussed the subject of advertising in the newspapers with any newspaper man.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I would not even inferentially suggest that the Senator from Idaho was influenced in that kind of a way; but I want to call attention to a few of these things. Once in a while I get in earnest, and when a proposition comes up that is as offensive to me as this is, I propose to speak out.

Some of these men have come here and insisted that the Congress should do business according to business methods, and the business method they have suggested is that we shall pay for their advertising space; but not one word have they said about carrying their magazines and their newspapers on a business plane. While we are paying eighty or ninety millions, as the experts tell us, to carry the newspapers and the magazines, we get only about eleven millions for this service, and now they come in here and ask us, by additional legislation, to give them another $5,000,000!

There are two ways to look at things which appear in the newspapers and the magazines. One is as reading matter, the other is as advertising matter; and will anyone tell me that the question of the sale of bonds is not reading matter in which a reading public is very greatly interested?

I was furnished the other day with a magazine in which there were very able articles written by some very able gentlemen, in which they condemned the unbusinesslike policy of selling these bonds by volunteer labor and insisted that the bonds should be sold in a campaign that is organized for their benefit, and that they should be paid for their advertising.

Mr. President, I want the Secretary of the Treasury to have every means possible to make this a success. If in his judgment it becomes necessary to pursue one course or another, he ought to be permitted to do it; but he ought to be the judge when it is necessary to advertise, and not the beneficiaries of this kind of legislation.

Mr. BRADY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Just one moment.

Mr. President, I have heard since I have been in the Senate much about pork-barrel legislation. I wonder what we shall call this? I want to say that the best newspapers of the country are opposed to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This is gravy.

Mr. POMERENE. It is somewhat putrefied. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] two or three weeks ago, in speaking upon this very subject, insisted to the Senate that the newspapers of the country would not want to be paid for this service. Imagine the banker, the lawyer, the preacher, the business man, the patriotic woman, the patriotic boy, the member of the Boy Scouts, asking to be paid for the service they render in the sale of the bonds of the country for the benefit of the country. I am glad they have not come here and put themselves in that class.

Mr. President, if it were necessary to pay 1 per cent to sell these bonds, I would be willing to pay it; if one-half of 1 per cent will suffice, I am willing to pay that; but it has not yet been shown to me that it is necessary to expend either one of these sums. The bill as passed by the House, it seems, provides one-seventh of 1 per cent, and my judgment is that it would be very much better if we would leave it at one-seventh of 1 per cent. We will be back here in a few weeks, provided we get away at all, and, if it is then necessary, we can vote an additional appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Right in that connection I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that if the campaign is for two billions or for four billions the expenses of the sale of the bonds during that campaign at any time can not exceed whatever per cent we provide for, or, in other words, we can not take more than one-seventh or one-fifth or one-quarter, or whatever we provide, based upon the amount of bonds that are sold in the campaign.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore if our campaign began, as it will, about the 1st of November, and lasted 30 days, that campaign would be over before the next session of Congress meets. So we must provide enough to take care at least of the first campaign.

Mr. POMERENE. How many of these bonds are expected to be sold during the first campaign?

Mr. SMOOT. I think for the first campaign the amount will be between three and four billion dollars—$4,000,000,000 more than likely. I mean with the war-savings bonds and certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. POMERENE. I have enough confidence in the American people to say that, in my judgment, those bonds will be sold without a paid advertising campaign.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that we are not providing in this for paying for newspaper advertising.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the testimony Secretary McAdoo gave before the House committee in relation to advertising in the papers and also the reasons why he asked the rate he did, and then made the statement at the same time that Canada provides three-eighths of 1 per cent, and that is 50 per cent more than we have provided in this bill, and that England provided a higher percentage for the sale of her bonds than we are providing in this bill.

Mr. POMERENE. That is now?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Did England do that during the first issue?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary does not say.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was called away from the Chamber on official business this afternoon and was not present when the Senator from Ohio took the floor. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if, under the terms of this bill, the power is not conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury to spend this money for advertising in the newspapers if in his judgment the public interests demand it, and therefore the authority conferred by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] is unnecessary?

Mr. POMERENE. It was my understanding that he was given carte blanche as to the method by which it could be spent.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That was my idea.

Mr. POMERENE. And that he could advertise if he saw fit. What I am objecting to is the special authorization here and a direction to advertise.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator has no doubt but that the money will be used to advertise in the newspaper and in other ways?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know how it will be used. I suspect if it was necessary to do it to make a success of this campaign he would do it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course I think such methods should be employed as may be necessary to make the campaign for the sale of the bonds a success. The money must be raised to pay the expenses of this war, but I really do not see any reason why the newspaper, which is a business enterprise, should be asked to give its space any more than an individual should be asked to give his time or his money in the promotion of this campaign. It is the duty of every citizen to contribute in every way possible to the successful prosecution of this war, but it is no more incumbent upon the newspaper to give its space than it is for a lawyer to give his time or a banker his money. I am opposed to any measure that would compel the newspapers to give their space without compensation. And I want to say just in this connection that I am opposed to the improper use of this money in the purchase of newspaper space for the creation of political sentiment. That, of course, will not be attempted. The newspaper is a business venture. It makes its money selling its space for advertising, and the Government has no more right to take it than it would have to take 80 acres of land without compensation to the owner.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; and in the ordinary avocations of life business men pay for the transportation of their wares, and publishers should do the same.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think Congress is culpable for not making the newspapers pay for transmitting them through the mail. I am not at all chargeable with the failure to do that, for the reason that I voted to make the newspapers pay for their transportation. Congress failing in its duty in that regard is no justification for confiscating the property of the newspapers now. This is purely a matter of business with the newspapers, and the Government can not afford to do them an injustice by compelling them to contribute that which they do not desire to contribute.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; it is a one-sided business proposition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think it is a one-sided proposition at all. The advertising space in a newspaper is a part of the newspaper's capital, and Congress has no more right to take it than it has to take the farmer's land or the lawyer's library.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite willing that they shall pay the cost of transportation and then pay them for this advertising, and let it apply as credit upon their bill for transportation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the Senator. I would make them pay for the transportation, and then I am in favor of the Government paying them for the service which they render to the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the bill as it first went to the House, expressing the wishes of the Secretary of the Treasury, allowed one-tenth of 1 per cent for the certificates and one-fifth for the bonds. It allowed the Secretary to save what he could at any one place of these allowances and use it in another; he could save on the certificate sales from the one-tenth and add it to the one-fifth on the bond sales.

The Senate committee, instead of putting what we knew would not be needed on the certificates, reduced the allowance on sale of certificates to a twentieth of 1 per cent and increased the allowance on sale of the bonds to one-fourth of 1 per cent, so as to make an allowance for each of what we thought would really be used. Beyond that change, which was practically to carry out the wishes of the Secretary, we made no change.

But I wish the Senate to understand something of how the money is used. In the first place, it cost over a million dollars to prepare the bonds and certificates of this first issue. I want the Senate to understand something about what becomes of the money. It cost over $1,112,000 to pay the expenses of the 12 reserve banks. So of the $2,680,000 used, $2,117,000 went to those two items.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. May I not suggest that it might have been well for the reserve banks to have been as generous as the newspapers were and to have given to the Government the million dollars' profit that they made in handling the bonds?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was utterly impossible. The Federal reserve banks are not private institutions in the sense that its officers could make such a contribution, and the great burden of the work fell on the 12 reserve banks instead of being distributed over the United States to the very many.

Again, it cost $190,000 insurance and other delivery charges on bonds and certificates. I just wish the Senate to understand that when it comes to what is supposed to be advertising by the Secretary of the Treasury he had no money for it. He spent on this first issue for publicity, including postals, buttons, and so forth, $140,000.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not quite clear that I understand the Senator's position. Does not the language, "That in order to pay all the necessary expenses, including rent," cover any possible items of advertising?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly. I am not questioning that; but I am letting the Senate understand where the cost was in this first issue—where the burden of expense was—and letting them see that the Secretary of the Treasury had no considerable fund for general use. He furthermore states in his testimony:

I should say that perhaps $2,500,000 more might not be an excessive estimate of the additional cost contributed in the last campaign by patriotic people all over the country. That would be $5,000,000 to sell $2,000,000,000 of bonds. That would be more than one-fifth of 1 per cent. It would be one-fourth of 1 per cent to sell that issue on that basis.

So the money expended on the first issue for the $2,000,000,000 of liberty bonds not only consumed the one-tenth allowed for the liberty bonds, but it consumed the large part of the one-tenth on the certificates. The certificates being short-time paper, running not over 12 months—usually less than that—were placed practically by sending them to large institutions. They were disposed of in large single transactions and cost very little. The one-tenth allowed for the bonds did not cover the cost. A part of the cost came out of the one-tenth on the certificates. Even then there was very little done by the Secretary for publicity. He only spent $140,000 for publicity. That was for posters, buttons, and similar work. When we consider that the postage stamps of the Federal banks, their telegrams, their extra force, cost the reserve banks $1,112,000, we realize the enormous extent of the work. The actual physical work of handling the sale was enormous.

Now, your committee thought we would seek to assign the privilege of expenditure where the cost came. We put one-fourth of 1 per cent on bonds. We put one-twentieth of 1 per cent upon the certificates. Really we do not think the certificates will cost over one-fortieth of 1 per cent, but we wanted, rather, to allow more than was necessary than to leave the campaign in progress with the Secretary hampered. We know he will act with judgment and spend wisely only what is necessary. In the sales he has already made there is a balance of $178,889, which he could have used, that was turned back to the Treasury.

The suggestion that Congress will be in session and that we can then make another appropriation is, after a moment's thought, not advisable. The Secretary will at once inaugurate a campaign for the sale of from two to four billion dollars of bonds and certificates. He must plan the campaign. He must plan his expenditures; he must plan his force; and he ought to know in advance practically what he is authorized to spend.

The question was up before the committee as to what treatment should be given this almost demand from a certain class of newspapers for the expenditure of money with them. The Secretary very frankly was opposed to any requirement that we should spend money on the newspapers. He said also frankly that if a general newspaper campaign was to be conducted one-fifth or one-fourth of 1 per cent would not be sufficient; that if a general newspaper campaign was conducted, it ought to go to all the papers in every part of the United States, and it would take another fifth to bear the expense, and he did not think it necessary. He said he had not advertised at all in the newspapers before and he did not think he would not have to do it under any circumstances in this campaign. He said it might happen that for some reason there would be something somewhere unusual that he would want to publish as an advertisement, but he did not contemplate it, yet he preferred not to be restricted by being required to advertise or denied the privilege. He did not favor a general advertising campaign, but if for some particular reason he thought it was necessary to advertise some particular matter, which he did not expect he would be called on to do, he would like to have a free hand. He realizes the great importance of the work and the responsibility put upon him. He realizes the strain of the work.

Mr. President, a campaign of this sort for the sale of bonds is just as heavy a labor as conducting a campaign over the United States in a national election, and we can not overestimate the importance that it should be well and successfully managed.

So far as I am concerned as a member of the committee, I would be willing the figures should go back to the one-tenth and one-fifth.

The one-twentieth and the one-fourth make about the same amount. We have simply put more money where it will be spent, and reduced the amount where the money will not be spent, and we are leaving the Secretary all he asks for, expressing it in a little different language.

I am opposed to any kind of a provision with reference to the newspapers. I would not say we absolutely should not print a line in a newspaper and pay for it. I do not think the Secretary will do it. I would rather say he should not than that he should. I would rather put in a provision that he absolutely should not pay for a line in a newspaper than to say he had to go into a newspaper field with advertisements. I think if we leave it as it is, 99 chances out of 100 there will not be a nickel paid to a newspaper; but I hardly think we ought to say that he shall not spend any of this money on newspapers. He has no idea of spending it there. He conducted a prior campaign without spending it, and he has not asked for a fund which furnishes him the money to spend in that way.

Now, with reference to the newspaper space being their business, that is not strictly true. Their subscribers are entitled to something from the newspapers. Their subscribers are entitled to the news. The handling of liberty bonds and the proper presentation of the mode of handling is news that the subscribers are entitled to. The newspaper that suppresses it would soon be in a position where its advertising space would not be of much account, for its lists of subscribers would fall off, and nobody watches subscription lists closer than an intelligent advertiser.

If we are going to say anything about it, we ought to say that it shall not be done. I think that is unnecessary. I think it is rather a gratuitous fling that might be misunderstood. I think we can afford to leave the Secretary of the Treasury with his hands untied to handle this subject. He has shown great ability in handling it before, and I trust him to show great ability in handling it in the future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the rate of allowance for the sale of bonds. Before the House committee the Secretary made this statement:

The Dominion of Canada, in offering its war loan under date of March 12, 1917, allowed a commission of three-eighths of 1 per cent on allotments made with respect to applications by recognized bond and stock brokers doing business in Canada. That is three-eighths of 1 per cent, you see, and that is just the commission to the bankers and brokers. Now, we understood that the last loan by Great Britain provided for a commission to the distributors of the bonds. Three-eighths of 1 per cent on a billion-dollar issue would require an expenditure of $3,750,000 for that one item alone, which does not include, of course, the cost of printing and engraving the bonds and other expenses necessarily incurred by the department. I should like to reemphasize the point, gentlemen, that if the Government of the United States is to continue to sell its bonds by popular subscription, including the cost of engraving and of conversion and the other expenses that are inseparable from an operation of such magnitude, at a cost of not exceeding one-fifth of 1 per cent we will do a phenomenal thing.

I want Senators to remember that under this bill there is a conversion privilege of the bond issue that has already been made, and that every owner of a liberty bond who desires to convert it into a 4 per cent bond will have that privilege, and it will not cost him one cent, but it will cost the Government of the United States the cost of engraving every bond that is converted.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BRADY. Is it not a fact that only a very small portion of the present issue of bonds has been printed?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a fact that it has been absolutely impossible for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to even engrave what we have already sold. We want the bureau to begin the engraving of the bonds provided for in this bill.

Mr. BRADY. I understood the Senator to be speaking about the great expense incurred by the Government on account of the bonds that have already been engraved, but they have not been engraved.

Mr. SMOOT. I know those bonds have not all been delivered; but they will be shortly. There is not any question about that.

Mr. BRADY. Not if the holder desired to exchange the 3½ per cent bond for a 4 per cent bond.

Mr. SMOOT. The large purchasers have not yet received their bonds, but the small purchasers throughout the country have. All the small denominations of bonds have been engraved and most of them delivered, if fully paid for. It is the small bondholder who is going to convert his bond. You will not find any large holder converting his 3½ per cent non-taxable bond into a 4 per cent partially taxable bond. They are not going to convert them when, under this bill, the surtaxes and excess-profits tax and income tax will be imposed upon the interest, but every purchaser of a bond who has an income of less than $2,000 or who is not taxed under the existing law and under the revenue bill that passed the Senate last Monday is going to convert his 3½ per cent bond into a 4 per cent bond provided for in this bill.

I want to refer now to the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury before the Senate Finance Committee. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] asked this question—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On what page?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Under the one-fifth of 1 per cent would you have sufficient money to use the other forms of advertising, some of which were used on the first campaign which you conducted; that is, billboards and window cards and circulars, and all that sort of thing? You surely ought to have a liberal appropriation for that. That seems to be an entirely unobjectionable form of conducting your campaign, and I think you ought to have enough provided for that as a contingency, if you want to resort to it again.

Secretary McADOO. The one-fifth of 1 per cent is tentative. I can not tell in these succeeding campaigns what the cost is going to be. I think they are going to be increasingly more expensive, but in the one-fifth I have not taken into consideration the cost of billboard advertising. The last time all of that advertising was given free. If we have to resort to that, I might hold that we would have enough to pay a reasonable amount in that direction. I think if we engage in paid advertising at all it is going to require an additional appropriation from Congress besides the one-fifth.

Senator SMITH. At the start you only wish a fifth?

Secretary McADOO. I am willing to try one more campaign on the basis of one-fifth for the bonds and a tenth of 1 per cent for the short-time certificates of indebtedness. Now, if I find that is not going to be enough because we can not cover the ground fully or because we shall have to adopt new methods, I shall come back and ask for another appropriation.

Again, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury—

Mr. BRADY. Before the Senator leaves that point—

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. Then the Secretary of the Treasury also made a statement in relation to the amount that would be required for newspaper advertisements. Speaking of the publishers' association, which is asking $3,000,000 for advertising, I had asked a question to that effect, to which this reply was made:

Secretary McADOO. The last figure I had was $2,600,000. Obviously, I could not engage in an advertising campaign at that rate, even with an allowance of one-fifth of 1 per cent. But it may be necessary to use some advertising. I do not know whether it will be in the newspapers or in some other form, but whatever form it is going to take it would have to be paid out of the appropriation that you make. I think a fifth of 1 per cent would be enough to enable me to see daylight.

Mr. President, as I have already stated, I do not believe that it is wise for us to provide only for an appropriation which the Secretary of the Treasury has already intimated would not be sufficient. I believe that every Senator would condemn himself if such an appropriation were made, and, if for any reason it was not sufficient, so that the campaign would have to cease toward its close and the bond issue should prove to be a partial failure. I can not conceive of such a disaster as that being made possible. If we were compelled to spend the money, even if not wanted, it would be an entirely different proposition. I know that it may be said, and I will admit, that there are very few appropriations which are made where the full amount appropriated is not expended; it is the history of our departments that they spend every dollar appropriated; but this is such a vital question that I thought rather than take any chances, as a member of the committee, I should prefer to make the allowance one-fourth instead of one-fifth of 1 per cent for the expenses of the sale of the bonds, for that is where the great expense will occur, and one-twentieth instead of one-tenth for the certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. BRADY. May I call the Senator's attention to the statement which he made during the discussion to-day in the Senate relative to the one-twentieth of 1 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. In reading the statement which the Senator has just read, quoting the Secretary of the Treasury relative to this matter, the Secretary of the Treasury says unqualifiedly that one-fifth of 1 per cent will suffice to handle the bonds and that he believes that one-tenth of 1 per cent would be sufficient to handle the certificates. The Senator from Utah said, in response to the question which the Senator from Idaho asked him some time ago that he was satisfied it would not take one-half of one-twentieth of 1 per cent to handle the certificates. If that is true, the department will be able to handle the certificates and have a considerable amount left to add to the one-fifth of 1 per cent which the Secretary of the Treasury says is sufficient to handle the bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Treasury does not say unqualifiedly that that will be sufficient.

Mr. BRADY. If the Senator from Utah can conveniently turn to the first statement from which he read, I should like to ask him to read it again. I may have misunderstood him, but my understanding is that the Secretary of the Treasury made that statement unqualifiedly.

Mr. SMOOT. He said it would be a phenomenal thing if that could be done; that is what he said.

Mr. BRADY. Read the statement, please.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read it. It is as follows:

I should like to reemphasize the point, gentlemen, that if the Government of the United States is to continue to sell its bonds by popular subscription, including the cost of engraving and of conversion and the other expenses that are inseparable from an operation of such magnitude, at a cost of not exceeding one-fifth of 1 per cent, we will do a phenomenal thing.

Mr. BRADY. That is quite true, but there was another statement just before that which the Senator read.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Treasury also stated:

I think a fifth of 1 per cent would be enough to enable me to see daylight.

Mr. BRADY. No; there is still another statement, to which I refer.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the other statement. There is only one other to which I have referred.

Mr. BRADY. That is the one I desire to have the Senator read.

Mr. SMOOT. Those are two statements that I read.

Mr. BRADY. There is still another statement, where the Secretary of the Treasury said that he could handle the bonds for one-fifth of 1 per cent, and the certificates for one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. The first statement that I read, the Secretary of the Treasury made before the House committee.

Mr. BRADY. The first statement which the Senator read—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Utah, who has the floor, will yield, I think I can supply the statement to which the Senator from Idaho refers.

Mr. SMOOT. I have it here. It is on page 49, and is as follows:

Secretary McAnoo. The one-fifth of 1 per cent is tentative. I can not tell in these succeeding campaigns what the cost is going to be. I think they are going to be increasingly more expensive, but in the one-fifth I have not taken into consideration the cost of billboard advertising.

Mr. BRADY. That is not the statement I want, and it is not the statement which the Senator from Utah quoted a short while ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Wait a moment. I am going to read the whole of the statement.

Mr. BRADY. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Utah do so.

Mr. STONE. Let us not spend the whole day on these things.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement is as follows:

Secretary McAnoo. I am willing to try one more campaign on the basis of one-fifth for the bonds and a tenth of 1 per cent for the short-time certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. BRADY. If the Secretary of the Treasury is willing to try it, I think we ought to be perfectly willing to let him have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if a larger amount is appropriated than is necessary, whether there will not be great pressure upon the Secretary of the Treasury to induce him to spend it all? Is not that the general result in the way of appropriations and as to getting them all expended?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have just made the statement that the rule generally is that every department of the Government expends every dollar that is appropriated, although in the expenditure of the amount appropriated for the liberty bonds there was turned back an unexpended balance of $178,889.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They could not expend it all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah says he is fearful we might not be able to finance the sale of these securities; but let me call his attention to the fact that the President has a fund of $100,000,000 which he can put to any purpose whatever. To no better purpose could it be put than to be expended in the issuing of these bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado says the fund which the President has is $100,000,000. It was that sum at one time, but I desire to tell the Senator now that it is far from that amount to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, Mr. President, where we make a specific appropriation to be used for a particular purpose, a general fund could not be properly used to add to it. I should regard that as a gross breach of propriety.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that that would depend entirely upon the wording of the act which gave that fund to the President. I think that we ought to give ample money for these purposes, but I do not think we ought to go beyond the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is right. If the President desired to expend a part of that fund to be used for advertising in the newspapers, or for any other purpose, he could expend it. There was no string put upon it; it was a direct appropriation of $100,000,000, to be expended by the President for any purpose he saw fit.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I do not desire my amendment to be voted on without making a very short statement in response to the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I fully appreciate his earnestness and his patriotism on all occasions; but he seems to have a fear that the men who control the newspapers of this country are trying to take something away from the Government without giving a consideration therefor. I do not desire at this time to discuss that matter, but I do want to call attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is either deceiving the newspaper men of this country or else he favors paying them for space.

I was somewhat surprised at the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury had indicated that he was opposed to advertising in the newspapers. My purpose at this time is to place the Senate and myself on record as to what we think should be done with a part of these funds. There is nothing unreasonable about it; the fund will be under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I do not want him, after we are giving him more money than he has asked for—he only asked for one-fifth of 1 per cent and we are very generously giving him one-fourth of 1 per cent—I do not wish him to say to the newspaper men of this country that he could not advertise because Congress would not give him the funds to do so. If he says that he does not advertise, I want him to say what the Senator from Georgia indicates that he did say before the committee, and that was that he was opposed to such advertising. Let us say by our acts that we are perfectly willing that he shall have this surplus fund, and the amount which I propose to insert here is just about the surplus sum that we are adding to the amount which he says is necessary. In speaking of this matter before the committee the Secretary of the Treasury said:

Some of the newspapers offered space free and actually advertised the bonds free of their own volition. I felt that it was not fair for the Government to ask them to furnish their commodity for nothing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator permit an interruption at that point just for a moment?

Mr. BRADY. I should be very glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When the revenue bill was pending before the Committee on Finance a very liberal proportion of time was given to the proprietors of newspapers, who appeared before that committee to plead against the increase in postal rates and in fact against any taxes to be imposed upon them that could be suggested. They were always in favor of some tax that was not suggested at the moment—like most people—and nearly all of them, as a sort of preface to their argument that the particular thing that was under consideration in the committee should be eliminated, called attention to the fact that the newspapers were rendering a great deal of service to the Government in this war in carrying news regarding bond issues and things of that sort; and that for that reason the hand of taxation ought not to be laid upon them at this time; and while, after many propositions were sifted and the usual paring and cutting took place, the committee did report to the Senate something of an increase in rates and a small imposition of tax upon their net profits, all that, under some very persuasive arguments, went out of the bill as it passed from the hand of the Senate, and the newspapers go free of any tax being imposed upon them so far as the provisions in the revenue bill relating to their business are concerned. I think it worth while to call to the attention of the Senate at this time, while it is considering the question brought so pointedly before it by the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, of paying them for furnishing what the Senator from Georgia calls "real news" to their readers—and he is a good newspaper man himself, and knows news when he sees it afar off—that here is an amendment proposing to pay them for printing news when they plead with the committee to ease up on the proposition of taxation because they were going to do the very thing for which it is now proposed to pay them extra.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing—

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRADY. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. There seems to be a very wide difference between the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Wisconsin, and I desire to offer a suggestion, which, it seems to me, might enable them to get together, namely, that we modify the amendment of the Senator from Idaho and provide something like this: "That the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay for the advertising of these bonds at regular advertising rates: Provided, That the newspapers and the magazines shall pay to the Government 50 per cent of the cost of transportation of their newspapers and magazines," and let the Postmaster General determine that question. I think that would be a fair proposition and would be businesslike.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest that the Senator from Ohio, who has pretty pronounced views on this subject, ought to be on the committee to determine the question.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I might accept the amendment of the Senator from Ohio if he would have the extra charge of which he speaks paid from the excess profits of the newspapers. I have not heard of very many newspapers having any very great amount of excess profits—

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President—

Mr. BRADY. I will yield in just a moment. Because some of the newspapers in the East have built up a great business and have made a large amount of money is no reason why we should try to injure the business of every little newspaper in the country. We ought to be at least fair with them; we ought to be at least just to them. The Secretary of the Treasury agreed with me in this matter, as I have indicated.

I again call attention to the fact that in speaking of advertising in the newspapers the Secretary says that the Government—ought to pay for it—

That is, the advertising—

at reasonable rates, because the only commodity the newspapers have is their advertising, and we ought not to ask them to give it for nothing, any more than to ask the steel mills to give their product for nothing or the farmers to give their produce to the Government for the purpose of war.

Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he thinks that it is fair, reasonable, and equitable to ask the bankers of this country to give the use of their capital to this Government without any recompense or without any interest? If not, is it fair to ask a newspaper man to give his services to the Government free? The only stock in trade the newspaper man has on this earth is his newspaper, just as the stock in trade of the banker is his banking capital. We would not think for a single moment of asking the banker to give the use of his money to the Government without interest. The newspaper men are just as loyal as are the bankers, and I am glad to say the bankers are just as loyal as the newspaper men. They are not asking this; they are not demanding this; but they are entitled to it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRADY. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am certain the Senator wants to be fair about this matter.

Mr. BRADY. I certainly do.

Mr. POMERENE. The newspaper men and the magazine men are now getting a bonus from this Government of seven-eighths of what it costs to transport their commodity. The steel man pays for the transportation of his steel; the banker pays for the transportation of his coin or his currency, as the case may be; and whenever the publishers will pay a substantial part of the cost of the service they receive from the Government I am willing to pay them for the service they are rendering to the Government.

Mr. BRADY. I know, Mr. President, that the steel corporations need a great deal of defending on the floor of the Senate, and I realize, further, that the Senator from Ohio is not the one who usually defends them; but, on the other hand, I want to call his attention to the fact that when he speaks of the newspapers getting this great subsidy he refers to a very few large publications in the East. What profit does the little country paper in Ohio secure from this privilege that is given to the great newspapers? Does the Senator mean to say that the country newspapers of the entire West, including the State of Ohio, receive any benefit from this bonus which he says the Government is paying to them? That bonus is paid to a few newspaper corporations, just as we are allowing the great Steel Trust to take war profits and to keep them.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Newspaper Publishers' Association, I understand, asked for not to exceed $3,000,000 for paid advertising.

Mr. BRADY. What publications? Does that apply to the small newspapers in Utah and Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. It applies to all newspapers in the United States.

Mr. BRADY. Would changing the law as the Senator suggests benefit the newspapers of Idaho or of Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not referring to that matter. I am referring to the Senator's amendment, and I want to call his attention to what it really means. All that the newspapers have ever asked, so far as I have heard, is $3,000,000 for advertising purposes. The amendment which the Senator has proposed here, making an allowance of one-fourth of one-fourth of 1 per cent for advertising space in newspapers will make a fund of $5,061,000, or twice what they have ever asked for.

Again, Mr. President—and I will not interrupt the Senator further, but I should like to call his attention to the whole matter and then I will take my seat—comparing the amendment reported by the committee with the provision agreed to by the House, there is only a difference in dollars and cents of one-fiftieth of 1 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. I simply want to call the Senator's attention to the fact—

Mr. STONE. Will not the Senator let us vote on this amendment?

Mr. BRADY. In just a moment. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the statement is made that—

Those who have carefully studied the liberty-bond advertising compute that $5,000,000 in advertising was gratuitously contributed.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I desire to say that I will be satisfied with whatever action the Senate may take in the matter; but, at the same time, I believe that it is only reasonable and fair that we should go on record here in favor of appropriating a reasonable amount for legitimate advertising.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, we have spent about as much time on this amendment as on the entire bill up to the time the matter was taken up. I should like to have the amendment stated, and let us have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 24, after the word "certificates," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That one-fourth of the one-fourth of 1 per cent herein provided shall be used under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for purchasing space in the newspapers and other periodicals of the United States for the purpose of advertising the bonds authorized under this act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STONE. I am afraid we will not get a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, we can not dispose of it without a yeas-and-nays vote; it is too important a question. I will, however, withdraw the demand for the present, and see what develops.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment reported by the committee, on page 13, line 22, striking out "one-seventh" and inserting "one-fourth," will be agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think I will at this time reserve a vote in the Senate upon the committee amendment adopted increasing the amount from one-seventh to one-fourth of 1 per cent.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 10, page 13, line 24, before the words "of one," to strike out "one-tenth" and insert "one-twentieth," and, on page 14, line 4, after the word "direct," to strike out "Provided, That the amount that may be expended for expenses for each said class of obligations shall not exceed the per cent herein stated for each total issue of said bonds, war-savings certificates, and certificates of indebtedness herein authorized," so as to make the section read:

Sec. 10. That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act, except under section 12, a sum not exceeding one-fourth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and war-savings certificates and one-twentieth of 1 per cent of the amount of certificates of indebtedness herein authorized is hereby appropriated, or as much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct: Provided, That in addition to the reports now required by law, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on the first Monday in December, 1918, and annually thereafter, transmit to the Congress a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Secretary is reading so rapidly that I can not keep up with him. I desire, however, to call the attention of the Senate to some phraseology on page 13 which I think is contradictory of another portion of the bill. I may be wrong about it, but if it is contradictory it is time to call the attention of the committee to it. In section 10, on page 13, in line 24, the committee amendment strikes out "one-tenth" and inserts "one-twentieth of 1 per cent." To get the meaning of that I ought to read back perhaps a little.

Mr. STONE. Let me ask if the Senator has reference to the provision amending a former act on page 15?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; it occurred to me that there is a contradiction there.

Mr. STONE. I expect to move an amendment to that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then the Senator in charge of the bill is aware of that discrepancy?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wanted to call attention to it.

Mr. STONE. I supposed that was what the Senator had in mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; and I thought attention ought to be called to it.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 11, page 15, line 3, before the word "bonds," to insert "the proceeds of the," so as to make the clause read:

Sec. 11. That bonds shall not be issued under authority of sections 1 and 4 of said act approved April 24, 1917, in addition to the $2,000,000,000 thereof heretofore issued or offered for subscription, but bonds shall be issued from time to time upon the interchange of such bonds of different denominations and of coupon and registered bonds and upon the transfer of registered bonds, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and, if and to the extent that the privilege of conversion provided for in such bonds shall arise and shall be exercised, in accordance with such provision for such conversion. No bonds shall be issued under authority of the several sections of acts and of the resolution mentioned in said section 4 of the act approved April 24, 1917; but the proceeds of the bonds herein authorized may be used for purposes mentioned in said section 4 of the act of April 24, 1917, and as set forth in the acts therein enumerated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 6, to insert:

That section 2 of an act of Congress approved February 4, 1910, entitled "An act prescribing certain provisions and conditions under which bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States may be issued, and for other purposes," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That any certificates of indebtedness hereafter issued shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States (but, in the case of certificates issued after September 1, 1917, only if and to the extent provided in connection with the issue thereof), as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and that a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of any certificates of indebtedness issued is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same."

Mr. STONE. It is in this provision that the matter appears to which the Senator from Wisconsin has called attention. In line 20, on page 15 of the committee amendments, I move to strike out "one-tenth" and insert "one-twentieth," so as to make it correspond with the previous provisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in section 12, page 18, in subsection (d), line 6, after the word "appoint," to strike out "upon the nomination of the" and insert "an assistant"; in line 7, before the word "auditor," to insert "an assistant"; in the same line, after the word "auditor," to strike out "an assistant to each"; in line 8, before the word "fix," to insert "to," so as to read:

(d) That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint an assistant comptroller and an assistant auditor and to fix their compensation, and to designate from among the persons to be employed hereunder one or more to act in the absence or disability of such assistant comptroller and assistant auditor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, subsection (e), page 19, line 11, after the word "comptroller," to insert:

No administrative examination by the War Department shall be required of accounts rendered and settled abroad, and the time within which these accounts shall be rendered by disbursing officers shall be prescribed by the comptroller, who shall have power to waive any delinquency as to time or form in the rendition of these accounts.

So as to make the subsection read:

(e) That it shall be the duty of all contracting, purchasing, and disbursing officers to allow any representative of the comptroller or auditor to examine all books, records, and papers in any way connected with the receipt, disbursement, or disposal of public money, and to render such accounts and at such times as may be required by the comptroller. No administrative examination by the War Department shall be required of accounts rendered and settled abroad, and the time within which these accounts shall be rendered by disbursing officers shall be prescribed by the comptroller, who shall have power to waive any delinquency as to time or form in the rendition of these accounts. All contracts connected with accounts to be settled by the auditor abroad shall be filed in his office there.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 22, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 13. That for the purposes of this act the date of the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government shall be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to go back to page 4. I send to the desk an amendment to be inserted at that point, and ask that it may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 24, it is proposed to strike out "any" and insert "a proportionate part of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 5, after the word "obligations," it is proposed to insert "issued upon such conversion."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President, on behalf of the committee, I send to the desk another amendment, which I ask to have agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 1, beginning with the word "said," the last word in the line, it is proposed to strike out all through the word "of," in line 3, or the following words:

"said act approved April 24, 1917, or of," so that it will read: "issued under authority of this act"; also, on page 5, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the comma after the word "act."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, an amendment was passed over, at the request of some Senator, on page 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was at the request of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I think so, possibly. I submit, as a substitute for that amendment, the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the committee on page 6, beginning on line 15, it is proposed to insert the following:

But the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into such long-time obligations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish the chairman of the committee would explain the purpose of the change suggested in this amendment. I could not quite follow it with the reading of the Secretary, not having the language before me.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury, through one of his assistants, Mr. Leffingwell, came down this morning and asked that that change should be made. He has sent to me the reasons for it, which I will read to the Senate:

The committee amendment appearing on page 6, lines 15 to 21, inclusive, would require the 3½ per cent short-time obligations which have already been acquired under the act of April 24 to be converted into 4 per cent bonds, even though none of the 3½ per cent liberty bonds, the proceeds of which were used to acquire such obligations, should be converted into 4 per cent bonds. This is contrary to the provision of the act of April 24, under which the foreign obligations were acquired. That act provides:

"If any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be by such foreign Governments converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act."

The committee amendment in its present form purports to require the conversion of these 3½ per cent obligations into 4 per cent bonds, even though none of the 3½ per cent liberty bonds, which were issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations, should be converted into 4 per cent bonds. The present act can not change the contract with the foreign governments in this manner. The right to convert the foreign obligations acquired under the act of April 24 depends upon the extent to which the liberty bonds issued under the act of April 24 are converted and not upon the rate borne by the United States bonds issued under the present act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say that I do not agree with the Treasury official that the language used by the committee does what he says it does, but I am perfectly satisfied with the changed language. I am sure our language did not do it. We knew we could not do it, but the language now suggested is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. STONE. Anyhow, the Secretary of the Treasury was not certain, at least as to the construction of the bill if it should become a law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, so far as the committee is concerned, I think that is the last amendment we desire to propose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have inserted at the close of section 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 3, on page 7, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

In case of a loan or credit or advance by the United States to any foreign country hereafter, the United States shall be reimbursed by such foreign country the cost of preparing, issuing, and selling the bonds of the United States in an amount equal to such loan, credit, or advance.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. I do not care to discuss it. It seems to me manifest that that ought not to be done.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only desire to say, in connection with the matter I spoke of a while ago, that there is an appropriation in this bill of $4,000,000,000 for the purpose of loans or credits or advances, as they are called, to the allies. That $4,000,000,000 is to be used from the bond issues provided for in this bill. The minimum expense of the issuance of the $4,000,000,000 of bonds provided for in this bill would be $4,000,000. One-fourth of 1 per cent would be in the neighborhood of $10,000,000, which it would cost, at the maximum rate provided for in the bill, to dispose of the bonds of the United States in order to obtain this money to loan to foreign countries. I see no reason why the foreign countries should not bear that expense. It is for their benefit, not for ours. It seems to me that instead of the United States being out of pocket in the transaction, it should be made whole. That is the only purpose and the only effect of the amendment.

Mr. STONE. Let us have a vote upon the amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have some amendments which I desire to offer to the bill. There are a number of them, and I have spoken to the acting chairman of the committee about them. I would suggest to him that I offer them all, and let them be printed, and that they be taken up to-morrow morning. They are somewhat important, as I view them, and I should like to have them considered by a quorum and voted upon by a quorum, if that is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I wish the Senator would have them offered, so that they can be printed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer seven amendments, and ask to have them all read into the Record.

Mr. STONE. Can we not have them printed?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask also to have them printed and laid upon the desks of Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes the following amendments:

Amend, on page 2, line 22, by striking out the words "denomination or" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "in"; and after the word "denominations," in said line, insert the words "of $20 or some multiple of that sum."

Amend, on page 3, at the end of line 4, by striking out the period and inserting a colon and the words: "Provided, That such bonds shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years from the date of issue, and payable 20 years from such date."

Amend, on page 3, line 20, by striking out the period after the word "interest" and inserting a colon and the words: "Provided, That such reduction or increase of allotments of such bonds shall be made under general rules to be prescribed by said Secretary, and shall apply to all subscribers similarly situated."

Amend, on page 10, after the word "prescribe," in line 4, by inserting the words "not exceeding 4 per cent per annum."

Amend, on page 10, line 23, after the word "rates," by inserting the words "not exceeding 4 per cent per annum."

In line 24, page 11, after the letter "(b)," insert the words "United States income taxes."

After the word "prescribe," in line 7, page 11, strike out the period and insert a colon and the words: "Provided, That if any such war-saving certificates be offered by the holder thereof for redemption, and upon such application be redeemed before maturity, there shall be deducted from the accrued interest an amount not in excess of 1 per cent per annum of the principal for the time such certificate has been outstanding."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, let those amendments be printed so that they may be available to Senators to-morrow morning. The Senator from Wisconsin has stated that he desires to have the consideration and disposition of the amendments he offers go over until to-morrow. In the circumstances, I think we will make just as good progress by agreeing to his suggestion, although I had hoped that we might be able to complete the bill to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I shall expect to take but a very brief time in explaining each of the amendments—not to exceed a few minutes—as to all except one or two of them, and as to those perhaps 15 or 20 minutes; so that I shall consume very little of the time of the Senate to-morrow, in discussion, at least, in presenting the amendments to the Senate; but I do regard them of considerable importance, and I should like the consideration of a reasonably full Senate upon them. That is the only reason why I ask that they be taken up to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I hope the whips on each side will take notice of this situation and exert themselves with their usual activity to have a quorum present.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 15, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 14, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art from everlasting to everlasting, whose mercy endureth forever, upon whom all our longings, hopes, and aspirations are stayed, cleanse us, we beseech Thee, from all guile, and hear us when we recommend ourselves and all our concerns to Thee; uphold us with Thy strong right arm and encourage us to every high and noble purpose, that we may reflect Thy glory in all our undertakings, now and evermore, in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2489. An act to create two additional associate justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia;

S. 2527. An act authorizing appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army;

S. 2334. An act to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes;

S. 82. An act to transfer Frederick W. Cobb from the list of chief machinists, United States Navy, to the list of chief pay clerk, United States Navy;

S. 2746. An act to authorize the recommissioning of former officers of the Regular Army;

S. 2380. An act granting to the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors; and

S. 2701. An act to provide for the awarding of campaign badges to the members of the Dental Corps, United States Army, and fixing the regulations for awarding same.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a minute and a half in which to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for a minute and a half in which to make a statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, when the bill known as the war-risk insurance bill was voted on yesterday evening I was, just before the vote, called temporarily out of the building, and I was not here to vote. The very efficient and courteous pair clerk, seeking to do me a kindness, no doubt, paired me with an absent Member. I mean no criticism against anyone, but under the circumstances, if the press conveys the truth to us at this particular time, if I had been consulted I would not have consented to the pair that was made by the pair clerk. I simply desire that to go into the Record.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4900, entitled "A bill to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," disagree with the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4960, known as the trading with the enemy bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced, as the conferees on the part of the House, Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. DEWALT, Mr. ESCH, and Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

SELECTIVE DRAFT OF ALIENS.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the alien-slacker bill. I think the explanation of it should be in the RECORD in order that Members should have knowledge of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the alien-slacker bill.

Mr. BURNETT. It is the bill H. R. 5067.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the address delivered before the judicial section of the American Bar Association at Saratoga Springs on September 4 last, by Hon. WARREN GARD, Representative in Congress from the third congressional district of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by Judge GARD, of Ohio, at the meeting of the American Bar Association. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the other day the gentleman obtained consent to have printed the address of former Justice Hughes. I notice that on the same day a similar request was granted in the Senate.

Mr. STEELE. I noticed that also.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire why it was printed twice in the RECORD?

Mr. STEELE. This address will not be.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought perhaps the honor might be conferred on our distinguished colleague of having this address printed twice.

Mr. STEELE. I understand it will not be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORGANIZATION OF CAVALRY AS FIELD ARTILLERY OR INFANTRY.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 5918, a bill introduced at the request of the Secretary of War and unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, authorizing the President to transfer Cavalry regiments to either the Infantry or Artillery during the present emergency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to call up House bill 5918, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5918) to authorize the President to organize provisionally as Field Artillery or Infantry and to use as Field Artillery or Infantry during the existing emergency such regiments of Cavalry as he may designate.

Be it enacted, etc., That during the present emergency the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to organize provisionally as Field Artillery or Infantry and to use as Field Artillery or Infantry during the existing emergency such regiments of Cavalry as he may designate: Provided, That immediately after the termination of the existing emergency such regiments shall be reorganized as Cavalry regiments in accordance with the prescribed organization of such regiments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this has the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. DENT. Yes; it has the unanimous report of the committee; and it is a bill about which I spoke to the gentleman myself the other day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, might we not have the bill read first?

The SPEAKER. The bill has just been read.

Mr. NORTON. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

STRENGTH OF THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an official statement showing the strength of the armed forces of the United States up to the 6th day of September last, both in the Army and Navy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

ARMED STRENGTH OF THE UNITED STATES, SEPTEMBER 6, 1917.

"On the 6th day of September, 1917, there were in the Regular Army, National Guard, and Reserve Corps of the Army 78,828 officers and 741,053 enlisted men. In the Navy there were 141,867 enlisted men, 41,473 Naval Reserves, and 14,500 Naval Militia in the Federal service. There were 5,000 men in the Coast Guard and 6,500 in the Hospital Corps; a total of 209,340. On this date the enlisted strength of the Marine Corps was 29,971; reserves in this service, 1,070; National Naval Volunteers, 704; retired men on active duty, 14. There were approximately 12,000 officers in the Navy and 1,166 in the Marine Corps.

"In other words, on this date the Army had, including officers and enlisted men, 819,881, and the Navy 254,263, a total armed strength on that date of 1,074,146 men, all of whom are volunteers. Prior to this time there was not a drafted soldier in a single training camp. The draft law was approved on the 18th day of May, 1917.

"On September 6 the Regular Army was composed of 308,145 enlisted men and 7,022 officers; the National Guard of 377,421 enlisted men and 12,250 officers; the Reserve Corps of 55,487 enlisted men and 32,215 officers. There were also 27,341 officers turned out of the training camps.

"Since war was declared 1,300,000 men have volunteered their services in one form or another for the defense of the country. Since April 6, 207,882 men have enlisted in the Regular Army and 214,419 in the National Guard; 77,187 men have enlisted in the Regular Navy, 16,705 in the Marine Corps, and 31,473 in the Naval Reserve.

"The following table showing the strength of the Navy and the Army, authenticated by the committee on public information, will, it is believed, be interesting:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief article by Dr. David Lubin, delegate from the United States to the International Institute of Agriculture, on food control.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by Dr. David Lubin, the American representative of the International Agricultural Society, with headquarters at Rome. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

IMPROVING WILLAPA HARBOR AND RIVER, WASH.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration Senate joint resolution 93, for improving Willapa Harbor and River, Wash., and ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration Senate joint resolution 93. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War may proceed with the work of improving Willapa Harbor and River, Wash., in accordance with the authorization in the river and harbor act of July 27, 1916, provided he is assured that the city of Raymond and other local interests will contribute the sum of $71,775, being one-half the actual estimated cost of dredging in the North and South Forks of the Willapa River above their junction and will comply with all the other conditions of cooperation imposed by the said act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I think some explanation should be made of this unheard-of action, in considering a Senate joint resolution which has never been referred to a House committee for consideration.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to explain it. In the river and harbor bill approved July 27, 1916, there was an appropriation for the improvement of Willapa Harbor and River, in the State of Washington. Local cooperation was required, and by a clerical error made by the district engineer the amount of the local cooperation was stated as $143,550, when it should have been only half that amount. It was not the fault of the committee or of the office of the Chief of Engineers, but was an unfortunate error committed by the district engineer, and thereby carried forward.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, carrying out the gentleman's explanation further, the law of 1916 reads in two ways, the one half to be contributed by the local interests not being the amount which was estimated by the engineers. I have a letter from Gen. Black, the Chief of Engineers, which explains it, which I will ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to insert in the Record a letter from the Chief of Engineers on this subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 21, 1917.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: 1. Referring to the letter from the city officials of Raymond, Wash., in reference to the improvement of Willapa Harbor, Wash., which was left at this office by your secretary a day or two ago, and also copies of certain correspondence between the city and the district engineer officer concerning the local cooperation to be required under the provisions of the river and harbor act of July 27, 1916, authorizing this improvement, I have the honor to state that the situation is substantially set forth in the accompanying letter of Maj. Hunt of July 25, 1917, to Mayor Little, of Raymond.

2. A regrettable mistake was made in the district officer's report on this improvement, whereby it was made to appear that local interests were to be required to contribute the sum of $143,550 to the cost of the improvement, instead of one-half of this amount, which was what he really intended to recommend as their share of the work. Congress appropriated the Government's apparent share on this basis, and the department does not, therefore, feel warranted in proceeding with the improvement unless the local interests give necessary assurances that they will furnish the whole of this sum of $143,550, if required for the prosecution of the work. It appears that local interests are not in a position to give this assurance, and the only apparent alternative is to await further legislation by Congress authorizing the work to proceed on the basis of local cooperation to the smaller extent originally intended.

3. A draft of a joint resolution concerning this matter was prepared by this office at the request of Senator Jones, and a copy is inclosed herewith for your information.

4. The correspondence left by your secretary is returned herewith.

Very truly, yours,

W. M. BLACK,
Brigadier General, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. STAFFORD. So, if I understand the gentleman from Washington, it was designed by the House that the local interests should contribute one-half of $143,550, and that is the amount proposed in this joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the purpose of this joint resolution is virtually to correct a clerical error?

Mr. SMALL. That is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5949, and pending that motion he asks unanimous consent that the time be controlled half by himself and half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET]. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, can the gentleman advise the House as to how much time is likely to be consumed in general debate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to state. There are one or two gentlemen who wish to discuss this bill. It is difficult to state how much time they will take. I have in addition requests for several hours upon this side.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is certain that it will occupy all of to-day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think without any doubt. I am uncertain how much time I shall occupy myself, because I wish to discuss some features of the bill, and there may be inquiries that will necessitate my occupying more time than I have any desire to occupy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is my intention to offer an amendment to this bill. I presume not many amendments will be offered. What will be the attitude of the chairman of the committee as to time on amendments? I would like to have about 15 minutes on the amendment, and not take up any time in general discussion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the matter in which the gentleman is interested, and, so far as I am concerned, I will not object to his occupying 15 minutes on his amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. FITZGERALD was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under agreement of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] will control the time, to be equally divided. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is unprecedented in amount. It carries appropriations essential for the proper conduct of the military operations contemplated by the American people in the present war. It makes adequate provision for the necessities of the Government, and it requires expenditures with resulting burdens unparalleled in the history of the world.

The fact that the United States is engaged in a war does not mean, and should not be the excuse for, gross extravagance and unbridled expenditure. The most important function that the House of Representatives has to perform at a time like the present is to exercise, to their full extent, the powers intended to be possessed by the House in the control of the public purse [applause] and to perform those duties in a manner that not only will reflect credit upon the House itself but will be of inestimable benefit to the country.

The Committee on Appropriations, unaffected by any question of partisanship, without prejudice or bias, without desire to embarrass, and with no intention to shirk any duty, undertook early in July the preparation of this bill. The estimates submitted for the consideration of the Congress aggregated $5,615,455,000. The bill recommends appropriations of $3,775,979,370, and authorizes contracts to be entered into by the Government in a sum aggregating $1,035,000,000.

After the bill had been completed by the committee, additional estimates aggregating $1,450,071,189, a sum larger than has been expended in any one year since the beginning of the Republic, were transmitted to Congress for its consideration. Since the bill has been reported the committee has been engaged in investigating those estimates in order to make their recommendations. Based upon those estimates, amendments will be proposed to the bill increasing the appropriations by $993,604,000 and contract obligations authorized by the bill $1,219,202,750. Considering the original and supplemental estimates, the total estimates submitted for consideration aggregate $7,065,526,525.

The bill, with the proposed amendments, will carry appropriations of $4,769,583,370 and authorized contract obligations of $2,254,202,750, a total of $7,023,786,130, or $41,740,405 less than requested.

This total is explained somewhat by the fact, however, about which I shall go into details later, but which should be noted at this time, that in connection with the program submitted by the Shipping Board appropriations were requested aggregating $915,000,000, and the committee, in order to enable the board to initiate the program for the acquisition of the ships deemed to be essential in the prosecution of the war, was compelled to make authorizations or give authority to enter into contract obligations of $849,000,000 that were not actually requested but were contemplated in the request for the appropriation.

The Committee on appropriations spent practically eight weeks, in sessions aggregating seven to eight hours a day, in an attempt to secure information upon which to base the committee's judgment on this bill, and, so far as has been possible without divulging military information of a confidential character, the committee has had its hearings printed, and they are available for the Members of the House.

I undertake to say that the hearings will contain a fund of information of very great value, and if Members will take the trouble to read them, they will have the answer or explanation to some of the criticisms that have been made that we are acting without information and in the dark regarding these matters.

Mr. Chairman, the House will undoubtedly be interested in a somewhat comprehensive review of the financial situation of the United States, contrasted briefly with the situation of some of the principal countries engaged in this war.

The appropriations for the current fiscal year in the regular annual appropriation bills aggregate $1,977,210,200. It has been estimated that approximately $910,000,000 of that sum is for the Military Establishment and may be credited to the war situation.

In addition, the act of June 15, 1917, the emergency deficiency bill, carried $3,281,094,451. The pending deficiency bill will carry $4,769,583,370. The bill for aviation in the War Department carried $640,000,000. The food-survey bill, $11,346,400. The food-control bill, $162,500,000. For the war-risk insurance bill $45,150,000 is provided, and the expenses authorized in the first bond act amount to $7,063,945.

It is estimated that the soldiers' insurance bill, which passed the House yesterday, will involve an expenditure this year of $176,250,000. The trading-with-the-enemy bill, still pending, $450,000. The expenses of the bond issue, the recent bill, $17,927,064.

We have provided $7,000,000,000 to be loaned to our allies, and the estimated interest on the public debt for the current year will be about $200,000,000.

These several sums make a contemplated expenditure during the current fiscal year, without attempting to anticipate conditions that may arise before the end of the fiscal year requiring drafts on the Treasury, of $18,288,643,452.

The estimated revenue from ordinary sources for the current year is $1,333,500,000. It is estimated that the revenue bill as it passed the Senate will provide $2,400,000,000, and I take these figures, although they are the highest estimate, so as to make certain there shall be no error in the conclusions I shall draw. The postal revenues will amount to about $334,000,000.

The total estimated revenue is $4,067,500,000. Our bond issue, considering both the financing of our operations and the advance to the allies under the two billions, aggregate $11,538,945,460, or a total anticipated revenue from loans and revenue of $15,006,445,460, or approximately $2,682,198,092 less than we propose to spend during the current fiscal year, which ends June 30, 1918.

It is well for the House to bear that fact in mind—that there must be provided during the current fiscal year, either through additional taxes or through some form of revenue based upon our present needs, without anticipating in any way the necessities that the future may occasion before the end of the fiscal year, approximately $2,682,000,000 more than the amount for which provision has been made.

It was such information that prompted me to state only a short time ago that before the end of the current fiscal year we would be compelled to take at least 80 per cent of the excess profits, and probably 60 per cent of all incomes above a very ordinary amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it embarrass the gentleman if I asked him one question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume when the gentleman estimates the bond authorization at $11,538,000,000 he includes the total authorization, comprising the two billion war-saving certificates and certificates of indebtedness of four billion, which can not be utilized all at once, and will not be available during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; if I recall correctly I did not include the four billions of one-year certificates of indebtedness. There are included, however, the $2,000,000,000 five-year certificates.

Mr. STAFFORD. The two billion of war-saving certificates are included.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The war-saving certificates are included, and the money will be required in this fiscal year. The one-year certificates of indebtedness are excluded since they have a special temporary function of providing quickly funds in anticipation of revenue from tax laws or loans, the proceeds of which replace the funds from one-year certificates.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should prefer to finish through the statement before I yield, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman spoke of 80 per cent excess profits being taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to go into that question at this time. I said that I expressed that opinion. It was based on the fact that I had this information at the time, but I do not wish to be diverted from this statement at this time by a discussion of that matter.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I just want to ask a question in connection with the gentleman's bond statement, so that the House may get with accuracy the amount of bonds that have been issued for domestic purposes. The gentleman includes of course the emergency certificates in his estimates. So far as the permanent bond issue is concerned there have been only $2,000,000,000 worth authorized for war purposes. There is not included of course in this bond bill the post office, which is permanent in the nature of five-year bonds, and neither does it include the $4,000,000,000 authorized, $2,000,000,000 in the last bill and $2,000,000,000 at this time of temporary certificates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The figures I have given, as I stated, are very conservative. Our requirements will be much in excess of the sum stated by me. Only yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the additional revenue required prior to June 30, 1918, at a sum in excess of $3,500,000,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to know what proportion of this money has been loaned to other nations for which we have securities?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not that information, and it is immaterial to the situation. We have authorized the loans to be made, and we expect them to be made during the current fiscal year.

Mr. Chairman, by an examination of a number of publications and seeking information from various sources, I have compiled some figures as to what has been expended by our allies since they have been engaged in this war. Those figures are based upon an examination of a very illuminating article by Mr. H. J. Jennings in the Fortnightly Review; from different publications issued by the Mechanics & Metal National Bank of the City of New York; from the Economist, of London; from figures compiled from official records of the French Government by the Library of Congress; from a publication entitled the Statist, which makes a specialty of such figures; and from the Journal of the American Bankers' Association. From those publications, all of which have to deal with these matters, while they distribute the moneys in different proportions to the different countries, the totals are approximately the same in all instances. It appears from available statistics and accurate estimates that Great Britain had expended until the 1st of August of this year $21,385,000,000. That includes $4,500,000,000 advanced to her allies, and deducting the $4,500,000,000 from the estimated expenditure of Great Britain upon the theory that that sum is included in the statements of expenditure by the Governments to which it was advanced, Great Britain has expended $17,750,000,000. In addition, there has been expended out of the advances made by India and the over-seas dominions approximately $750,000,000. So that the total expenditure by Great Britain in the three years in which it has been engaged in the war is $18,500,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at this time. The estimated expenditures of France during the three years are $15,327,400,000. The estimated expenditures by Italy during the time she has been in the war, which has not been since the outbreak, but up to the 1st of August of the current year, is $3,120,000,000. The estimated expenditure of Russia, which is more or less conjectural because of inability to get figures, but based upon studies of financial experts of the world, is $15,000,000,000. So that the total expenditure of the entente allies since the beginning of the war aggregates $51,947,400,000.

Germany, including the advances made to Turkey and Bulgaria, it is estimated, has expended $21,300,000,000, and Austria-Hungary $12,800,000,000, or a total of $34,100,000,000.

The total expenditures by the nations engaged in war since it began three years ago are approximately $90,000,000,000. The United States is proposing the first year it is engaged to expend about 23 per cent of the expenditures of all the nations in the three years they have been engaged in the war. The United States is proposing to expend the first year approximately as much as Great Britain has expended in three years, more than France has expended in three years, and about 65 per cent of the total expenditures of Germany and Austria-Hungary in three years. Mr. Chairman, I have presented—

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will now yield.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman's totals include the expenses of those Governments or war expenses? Is there any difference made with reference to the amount spent for war and for all purposes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have taken the total expenditures of the British Government. I have been unable to ascertain whether the figures given for some of the other Governments include the normal peace expenditures, but the expenditures of the British Government, the normal peace expenditures of that Government, would have been less than $3,000,000,000 unless their expenditures had been very greatly augmented by reason of new domestic policies.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, ought not it also to be stated, however, that a considerable portion of our expenditures for this year makes provision for two years for the Army?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. In the estimate of this country's expenditures—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just a minute, just let me finish the answer, because I do not wish to get the record confused. We are proposing to expend this year very considerable sums of money for equipment to enable operations to be conducted in the future, but the British Government and the French Government and the other Governments during the past three years have been making expenditures anticipating the future, so that they balance one another. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Our expenditures, as estimated by the gentleman, include the loans, I understand, to the allies?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I so stated, and in order to make the comparison accurate I deducted the amount of loans made by Great Britain to other governments. As the moneys we have been advancing have not in appreciable extent been expended by the allies, including them in these figures does not materially affect the result. I have presented these figures to the House, Mr. Chairman, at this time in order if possible to awaken the Members to the tremendous task that confronts the American people and to create a sentiment that will make it impossible to put a further burden upon the Public Treasury for any purpose whatever that is not absolutely essential. [Applause.]

Moreover, my purpose is not to arouse any doubt or suspicion as to the propriety of our action. Most fortunately, however slowly we may have begun, a comprehensive view has been taken of the situation and our military experts are anticipating the needs of the future. To what extent it is impolitic to discuss. It should suffice to say that a proper appreciation of our task resulting in the request for moneys to enable adequate preparation is to be made, and providing for operations of a magnitude essential for success is the most commendable feature of the policies adopted. Some matters were presented to the Committee on Appropriations that are highly meritorious and which in normal or even somewhat strained conditions the members of that committee would readily and heartily recommended to the House for appropriation; but a consideration of the figures which I have reviewed and some consideration of what the future will develop convinced everyone that only the most rigid and careful elimination, not of the unnecessary things, not merely of the undesirable things, but an elimination of everything that was not of an imperatively necessary character could alone save the country from a yoke that would become intolerable.

Mr. Chairman, I did not have the opportunity to obtain information of a similar character about other countries, but the following figures relative to the British Government will be of very great interest to the Members of the House: The total expenditure of $21,385,000,000 by Great Britain is met by obtaining from taxation $5,410,000,000, and through loans $15,975,000,000. The proportion of taxes to loans is $1 of taxes to $3.93 of loans. Excluding from their calculation the loans to their allies, which as it has been stated are to be returned and are expected to carry themselves, the proportion of taxation to loans is $1 in taxes to $2.56 in loans.

The financial publications of Great Britain and the speeches of her public men emphasize continually that the one thing that the country is to be congratulated upon is the fact that the taxing power has been utilized to such an extent that the stability of the credit of Great Britain is just as secure to-day as it was before the war began [applause] and that its security and stability in the future has been enhanced by the fact it has resorted so largely to the taxing power in undertaking to raise those necessary revenues. Its public debt has been increased by over $15,000,000,000 since the war began, and my recollection is that before the war began its public debt had aggregated $3,500,000,000, and it is estimated now that the public debt of Germany is about $25,000,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In regard to Great Britain, the gentleman said awhile ago that he thought it would be necessary for us very largely to increase the rate on higher incomes. Now, the gentleman will realize that in our tax measure the normal tax is only 4 per cent, whereas in Great Britain the normal tax is 25 per cent. In other words, they raise a very large proportion if not the bulk of their taxes from taxation of the comparatively small incomes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman must remember that in Great Britain the system of taxation is so different that the absence of any tariff tax and the absence of certain local taxation to which people are subject here but are not subject in Great Britain accounts for the fact that they may make the initial tax much higher than can be done in this country.

Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that if he wishes to discuss the relative percentage on incomes which should be included in a tax bill he should debate it with his colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman does not mean that Great Britain does not raise a very large sum annually from the tariff taxes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Am I expected to answer that?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sufficiently familiar with the matter to know the extent to which its revenues are derived from its tariff.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will doubtless be glad of enlightenment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not in proportion to the percentage of our revenues obtained in the halcyon days of the protective tariff.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wish to suggest to the gentleman, for information, that Great Britain raises half a billion dollars a year out of her tariff taxes—$500,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman a few moments ago was discussing the relative proportion of taxes and bonds raised by Great Britain, and attributed one reason of that country's credit being so firm now to the fact that it collected such a large proportion of the money raised to run this war from taxation. My recollection is that Great Britain's proportion of taxes raised, compared with the whole debt, is 27 per cent. Now, I agree with the gentleman from New York that all the taxes possible should be levied during this war, but I think he will agree with me that we ought not to go so high as to cripple for the next year the tax-producing power by which we must raise taxes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall discuss how high we ought to go in different directions when the gentleman proposes his suggestion in a revenue bill.

Mr. GARNER. It is a question of how high you can go—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I gave this information to the House for what it may be worth. I stated my own view on the matter several months ago; that is, that the proper policy is to obtain all the money possible by taxation and the balance by loans. [Applause.] What the percentage should be can not be arbitrarily determined. After the amount of taxes that can be obtained is ascertained and the amount of money required is known, then it will be easy to tell the relative relation of the taxes and the loans; to fix arbitrarily any particular percentage in advance of determining what can be obtained through taxation, in my opinion, would be a policy that would be difficult to justify.

Mr. Chairman, before I refer to some items in the bill I wish to discuss another matter that has been discussed somewhat in the House and somewhat in the public press—the proposition to create what is known as a joint committee on war expenditures. The speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] delivered in the House on the 8th of September is the most comprehensive statement put forth in advocacy of that proposition. He calls attention to the fact that the functions of the proposed committee are accurately defined in the various resolutions that have been introduced. They provide:

It shall be the duty of said committee to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditure of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress and the contracts relating thereto made by officers of the executive departments, and it shall be the duty of the executive departments, on request, to keep said committee fully advised as to such expenditures and contracts.

Such committee shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards, or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war, with a view to safeguarding expenditures.

The President of the United States, when a provision to create such a committee was proposed in the food bill in another body, wrote a letter to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], in which he said:

The constant supervision of Executive action which it contemplates would amount to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the Executive work of the administration.

Mr. Chairman, after very careful consideration I believe that the President has more accurately stated the effect of that committee than has been stated by anyone else. The proposition to create that committee is not only a misunderstanding of what the functions of the House of Representatives are, but it would result in the abdication of the powers we possess and abandonment of the policy that should be pursued.

Under our policy, before the administration or the executive department of the Government can initiate any policy that involves public expenditure it must first submit its recommendations to the legislative body, and the authority to initiate the policy must be provided by legislative action. After the policy has been initiated by legislative action, the administration, or the Executive, must submit to the Congress the proposals of expenditure it proposes to make in order to carry the policies into effect. Before the policies can be carried into effect the Congress must, after investigation and consideration, determine the extent and the character of the work to be done by making appropriations as the result of legislative action. When the legislative has performed those functions, when it has authorized the policy, when it has defined and limited the extent of the policy, when it has provided the funds to enable the policy to be carried out, it has done all it should do in connection with the expenditure of the money, except such auditing or checking as may be appropriate after the expenditure is made. But the duty of carrying on the policy, of conducting the work, of making the expenditures, of doing all of the things connected with such work is purely an Executive function; and to attempt to hamper the Executive by the setting up of an espionage committee or an interfering committee or a meddling committee would do more to embarrass the proper administration of the Government than anything else that can be done by the Congress.

Anyone who is familiar with the difficulties that the officials of the Government have labored under in attempting to do the work essential to our proper preparation for war, because our organization has been such that it is practically impossible to find some individual who has the power, or if he had the power, is free to exercise it so as to accomplish something, will appreciate how grievous an error it would be to set up, as another instrumentality that had to be considered, that had to be consulted and had to be conferred with before any executive act could be done, a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress upon the theory that such supervision and regulation or control of executive acts would be beneficial. Once the Congress created such a committee it would become indifferent to the performance of those more important functions which belong to it; that is, of not permitting the executive to have blanket authority to act in any way it pleases, and not to give it blanket authority to expend money in any way it pleases, not to give it enormous lump appropriations that could be expended without restriction in any way it might please the particular individual who had charge of the particular service for which the appropriation is made.

What the legislative body should continue to do is to insist that matters of policy should not be initiated without legislative authority, and to determine after full and complete investigation in advance the amount of money that shall be available to carry out any authorized policy; to prescribe any limitations that may be deemed proper and essential, and then to leave to the executive department of the Government the executive functions of the Government.

It is a peculiar coincidence that during the time this question has been discussed so much in this country, a question of very similar character should have occupied the attention of the British Parliament. A most illuminating and the most convincing debate that has ever been carried on, which demonstrates the immense superiority of the system in vogue in this country over the system in existence in Great Britain, is to be found in that discussion in the House of Commons. On the 6th day of July of the current year a motion was on the paper and debated—

That this house is of opinion that in view of the continued growth of expenditure, taxation, and debt a committee be appointed, consisting of members of this house, with power to review all national expenditures, examine ministers and officials, and report to the house.

In order to understand the meaning of that motion it is necessary to understand the system in vogue in the British Government. At the outbreak of the war the Government announced to the House of Commons that it was impossible to submit estimates of a definite character for the service of the departments; that the country was at war; that no one could anticipate what its needs would be, and that it had to be given practically blanket authority to expend as it pleased. So the system was adopted of submitting what have been referred to as token estimates, mere guesses of the moneys needed for the various services which are discussed in a general way, and then voted by the Commons.

It should be recalled that when the Government makes up its budget and submits it to the House of Commons there is no examination of ministers, there is no inquiry into the questions involved by the members of the house. There is a mere discussion of policy and a vote taken. Under the law within nine months after the expenditure is made the accounts are transmitted to the comptroller and auditor general, who is an officer of the House of Commons, who audits the accounts and subsequently submits them to the committee on public audits and accounts of the House of Commons, and within 14 months after the expenditures are made they for the first time inquire into the expenditures and ascertain whether the expenditures were made for purposes authorized by the law, and some 18 months after the expenditures are made the House of Commons gets for the first time a report which at all approximates the character of a report which we receive when bills are presented to the House for consideration.

I shall read from one of the speeches only—there are a number of interesting extracts—but this probably gives a better insight into the opinion prevailing in the House of Commons, of the situation prevailing there and in this country, than any other part of the debate. Sir T. Walters, in the course of his remarks, said:

What we feel at present is that the executive power of this House is falling into too small a number of hands, and that the executive is tending to ignore the proper function of the House, which is to control the executive. I do not say this in any critical or offensive sense. I am not for a moment suggesting that the Government, past or present, is conspiring in any way to deprive the House of Commons of its legitimate function, but I do say that, slowly but surely, the powers given to the House of Commons relating to finance are being reduced, are being whittled down until they are almost taken away from the house, and that the executive of the day, instead of being the servant of the house is becoming its master, and that ministers, instead of feeling that they must submit questions of policy to the house, that they must confer with the house, and consult the house and take their instructions from the house, have come to regard the House of Commons as a sort of necessary nuisance which they are quite justified in ignoring and neglecting. Some of us feel very strongly about this, and we know that in this particular criticism we have the support of the country behind us. Ministers must not imagine that when they are given a free hand for the prosecution of the war—that is a phrase which is becoming almost nauseous—the country desires that in all these important questions of expenditure and commitments in advance of expenditure the elected representatives in the House of Commons should be ignored—that they, the executive, are possessed of some divine and supreme power and nobody has any right to control or criticize them.

Therefore, to make that point quite clear, and in order that there shall be no mistake as to what is in our minds and what is our policy, we ask for a specific and definite thing. We say that we want a committee of this House, not a sort of general purposes committee, not a sort of general accounts committee of that amiable and philanthropic description which the honorable gentleman who has just spoken has described, but that we want a committee of this House which shall be the guardians of and responsible for the privileges and responsibilities of this House that shall call ministers before it and say, "What is your financial policy? We see you have in your estimate a proposal to buy all the coffee and cocoa taverns. We want you to tell us what is your financial policy in that respect and to indicate what are the present and future commitments involved thereby." We want this committee not only to examine ministers, but if it is not quite satisfied with the information given by them—I live in perpetual fear of ministers, and I do not want to be disrespectful to them—the committee shall say, "We want to see the principal officials of your department and to know what they are doing, whether they are having private meetings and making commitments, whether they have any scheme for the acquisition of fried-fish shops all over the country." I do not think I need pursue the subject, which is merely by way of illustration. We want to restore to the House of Commons not merely the right to audit the expenses that are being incurred, but to control the financial policy and expenditure of the country. I can not conceive why the executive should ever dream that they really constitutionally possess the power that they have exercised. I will not refer to the French constitution, but I will take the case of the American Constitution. There, of course, the executive powers are not possessed either by the House of Representatives or by the Senate. They are vested in the President; but notwithstanding that fact, although the House of Representatives has not even the theory of executive responsibility, yet they feel it to be their duty to have their financial committees and actually call before them the members of the President's Cabinet and the great officials of the department. Though the House of Representatives has no power to dismiss the President or any of his ministers, or to dismiss even the humblest subordinate official in any department, yet as the House of Representatives has the power and duty and obligation to vote supplies, it has been deduced by an intelligent, enlightened, and free people that having to vote the money they also have the power to cross-examine as to what is the policy of the executive power of the State, even though that executive power is quite independent of the elected authority. When you come to examine the position in this country and find that the executive power is not based by a separate vote and election in the prime minister and the war cabinet, or any other cabinet; that all the executive power these ministers possess is power derived from this House of Commons; that they are subject to dismissal by an adverse vote of the House of Commons; that they have no power except what they have taken from the House of Commons, then, I say quite calmly and equably, that it is a piece of arrogant presumption on the part of any executive to adopt any financial policy and ignore the views of the House of Commons.

Mr. Chairman, that is a sample of the character of debate in the House of Commons. They have no power, nor do they exercise the right that the House of Representatives always exercises before it initiates any great policy, or any policy involving an expenditure of moneys, or the appropriation of a single dollar. We call the heads of departments; we call the officials in those departments familiar with the details; we compel them to furnish not only information as to their policy, but information that convinces the House of Representatives that the policy should be adopted and that the money requested should be provided in order to carry out the policy. No other method would be tolerated. Yet here is great, free, enlightened Great Britain, after three years of war, facing a commotion in the House of Commons which compels the Government, as the result of that day's debate, not to give a committee, which has the powers that the committees of the House of Representatives have and exercise, but a committee of much more limited powers, in order to satisfy the demand there that the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, should have control of the expenditures of the Government.

In the speech of the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Bonar Law, in stating that he was prepared to meet this demand, he stated—and it was conceded by those advocating the adoption of the motion that was presented—that no toleration would be given to a suggestion that that committee should in any way pass upon questions of policy that the Government would determine; that to permit any committee of the House of Commons to question matters of policy would be to diminish the responsibility that every minister must have and exercise, and that the only thing that they could do was to determine the extent of the expenditure to be made.

In this Government we have no such system. No head of a department can initiate any policy without previous legislative authority. Under very great emergencies of the war some things are done—contracts are made, purchases are proposed—which Congress is later requested to ratify. Such action has been acquiesced in by the Congress because of the tremendous, vital importance to the national security and defense; but no such course of conduct has ever been tolerated or ever will be tolerated as a permanent policy, and I hope that this House will not be misled into the creation of such a committee. One of the inevitable results will be what we are likely to face in the very near future, and one of the things that the Congress has not been giving the attention which it ought to give. Under the law the departments of the Government are to-day preparing the estimates to be submitted to Congress at the beginning of the next regular session, upon which appropriations for the fiscal year beginning the 1st of July, 1918, are to be made. No living man can at this time prepare an estimate that has any value as to what the expenditures for the War Department or the Navy Department will be for the fiscal year 1919.

There are two ways of overcoming it. The British Government adopted one, which created this uprising in the House of Commons. That was to tell the House of Commons that it was impossible to give any information, that they simply had to vote the moneys and let the Government spend them as they determine to be necessary. The French Government adopted a different system. It has the system of grand committees or commissions, some 23 or so, and they require the Government to submit estimates every three months for the moneys required for the conduct of the war, and do not attempt to anticipate the future to an appreciable extent.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken a number of times in favor of one committee to control appropriations. The present situation emphasizes more than any other period in the history of this Government that all of the appropriations of the Government ought to be in the control of one committee, and so that there may not be any misunderstanding I do not say in the control of the Committee on Appropriations as it now exists; but all the appropriations ought to be in control of one committee, so that that one committee in the coming years will be able to hear and determine the relatively important or unimportant matters, and not put a burden upon the people because of lack of information that will exist and must exist if the eight or nine different committees are to make recommendations for appropriations, as they have been doing in the past.

That is a matter which ought to occupy the attention of the House, although I doubt that it will do so. I have endeavored very briefly to point out at various times the reason for so doing. Anyone at all familiar with the present existing situation knows that if we scatter appropriations to be made in the future among a number of committees there will be absolutely no way whatever for this House to exercise the proper control that it should.

There are some matters in the bill to which I wish to make brief reference at this time. This bill involves not only very extraordinary expenditures but it involves policies of the very first importance. The committee is called upon not only to determine whether certain amounts of money shall be recommended for certain specific purposes but it is called upon to determine in the first instance whether projects or policies which will involve very extraordinary appropriations shall receive initial approval and recommendation of the House as a basis of the appropriation.

In an amendment which will be submitted is a matter of the first importance. In the emergency deficiency bill, approved June 15, 1917, a building program for merchant ships involving the expenditure of $750,000,000 was authorized. If the amendments recommended by the committee are adopted, it commits the Government to an expenditure during the next 24 months for this purpose of $1,934,000,000. The committee had placed before it complete information as to the program, as to the necessities of the Government, as to the vital importance of the matter, in connection with the prosecution of this war, and in this matter, as I may say in connection with practically every matter of importance in this bill, there has been no difference of opinion among the members of the committee. Both the majority and the minority members have been in accord as to the necessity of initiating the policies and as to appropriations to be made. There may have been some differences of opinion as to whether the amounts carried were adequate for the purpose during the current fiscal year, but there was no radical difference about them, since it was realized that even if Congress adjourned, it would be in session in December, and that ample funds are provided in order to carry the work beyond the time when additional moneys will be available.

In amendments to be offered there will be one authorizing obligations to be incurred to the extent of $350,000,000 for the purpose of obtaining torpedo boat destroyers, as the most effective weapons against the submarine menace.

One matter of considerable importance that was not recommended, although originally requested by the department, is as follows: The original intention was to have 32 cantonments for the training of our soldiers. Subsequently the program was modified so that there should be 16 cantonments and 16 camps for the National Guard. The estimates submitted to the Congress contain items aggregating $74,000,000 for the purpose of converting the National Guard camps into cantonments, but upon investigation and upon a statement of the Secretary of War that proposed policy has been either abandoned or suspended, the committee determined that the necessity for that conversion did not exist, and so eliminated $74,000,000 that would otherwise have been expended for that purpose.

Perhaps the one matter of controversy in the bill—which I shall not discuss at this time but shall discuss later—is the question of providing a proving ground. To avoid a discussion at this time I shall leave the matter until the item is reached.

The bill carries appropriations for mounts for certain heavy guns that are to be used by our troops. A number of guns, which from the standpoint of our present scheme of coast defense are considered obsolete or which are not of a character of prime importance and can be readily replaced and the removal of which will not affect the effectiveness of our coast defense, are to be taken and sent abroad with our troops, because it is impossible to get guns of that character in any other way.

There is a recommendation that the Navy Department and the War Department at the present time be authorized to advance 30 per cent on contracts before materials are delivered, upon adequate security being taken. That is to enable the Government to aid in financing plants that otherwise could not carry on the work that it is essential should be done for the benefit of the Government.

There is a recommendation that the Ordnance Department may, in the absence of other specific authority, make contract obligations for ordnance material and supplies not to exceed $100,000,000, the purpose being to obviate certain delays which are inevitable, but which can be readily obviated in this way. This provision is recommended in view of the fact that thus far the Congress has not declined to honor any request of the War Department for ordnance or munitions. And, so far as can be ascertained, there is no likelihood that any such request will be refused. So it is believed that with this limit and this authority, time would be saved in the acquisition of material that is essential for the proper prosecution of the war.

There are a number of other matters, but I have occupied more time than I had intended, and I shall only refer to one. Others will be discussed by other Members and myself when the items are reached.

It is very difficult to appreciate the tremendous expansion in the Government services connected with the war. The mere clerical force that is required to conduct the business is almost as staggering as the sums required to conduct the war. The committee had before it requests for approximately $15,000 square feet of space to provide accommodations for the increased force needed by the Government. Those requests were submitted in the form of suggestions that authority be given to negotiate with various parties for the construction of buildings upon the basis of five-year leases. That would have resulted in emphasizing the unfortunate condition now existing by which various bureaus of the same department and some divisions of the same bureau, all of which for an efficient and economical conduct of the public business should be under one roof, would be more widely scattered than before. The Congress at its last session created a commission upon the housing of the permanent activities of the Government, which commission consists of six Members of the Senate, six Members of the House, the Supervising Architect, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Superintendent of the Capitol. The Members of the Houses are taken, three from members of the Committees on Appropriations and three from members of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds. I request the chairman of that commission to convene it and this matter was submitted to the commission. The three technical members of the commission were authorized to investigate and report upon a building with its cost, its location, and other matters.

As a result of the unanimous action of that commission, this bill, instead of carrying items of rent for various privately owned buildings, carries an item of $2,000,000 to construct a temporary building to contain approximately 1,055,000 square feet, upon the reservation at Sixth and B, the site of the old Pennsylvania Station. This building will have a life of more than six years. If it is used for five years, the saving will be in excess of $2,000,000, and the indications, so far as it is possible to judge, are that probably before the expiration of the present fiscal year the necessities of the Government, as they grow with this war, will require a building of equal size to accommodate the services that will be required. So the committee has unanimously made this recommendation. It is believed that it is not only a very economical provision but that the tremendous increase in the efficiency that will come from enabling the two great departments of the Government, the War Department and the Navy Department, to bring all of their services under one roof is something that can not be estimated in money value.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I congratulate the committee upon having reached that conclusion and having one building instead of a number of small ones. Where did the gentleman say it is to be located?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Upon the site of the old Pennsylvania Station, at the corner of Sixth and B Streets, right off Pennsylvania Avenue, where there are ample transportation facilities.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the building is to house just what bureaus?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The building is to house the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the committee consider as the site available for this temporary structure the property owned by the Government, which has been owned for a number of years, immediately to the south of Pennsylvania Avenue near Fifteenth Street?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. That was one of the sites considered. There were objections to it of a serious character that made it impossible to get an agreement upon it. In the first place, the Government is deriving considerable revenue from the buildings now occupied there.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have in mind more the two squares to the south of the square fronting on Pennsylvania Avenue. That property is not occupied with any substantial buildings, but mostly rookeries and a building utilized for storage purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That space would not give the accommodations required.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course it would have the advantage of being much nearer to the present headquarters of the State, War, and Navy Building, which would be a great asset.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In view of the space that would be given, it was not believed that the additional distance would be any serious disadvantage.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will this building be reserved exclusively for the War and Navy Departments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is provided exclusively for the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman realizes that with the proposed revenue to be raised as contemplated by the bill now in conference the Treasury Department is going to be compelled to have additional space. Did the committee take into consideration the question of providing quarters for that department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This building has approximately 200,000 square feet more than the requests submitted. It is believed that the War and Navy Departments will find it advantageous to remove from some of the buildings which they now occupy some of their bureaus into this building, and that buildings of that character would be available for the Treasury Department. Then there is a proposal to erect upon the lot next to the Belasco Theater—the bill has already passed the Senate and is pending in the House—a modern office building, to cost one million and a quarter dollars, which would give the Treasury Department ample facilities, and which is a very desirable thing to do, in my opinion, from a business standpoint.

Mr. GARNER. I join the gentleman in that opinion, because I know the crowded conditions and the way the Treasury Department is at present hampered in its work, and I think this building ought to be constructed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it contemplated that the entire War and Navy Departments shall move into this new building, including the Secretaries?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not. That is a matter that is left entirely to the heads of the departments.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question not along that point? There has been some complaint among certain officers because they were not able to get their money—to get their pay. I talked with one in the aviation—

Mr. FITZGERALD. What kind of officers?

Mr. FESS. Aviation officers. I was wondering why that is. Is it because there has been no appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no trouble about any officer getting paid because of lack of appropriations. I have heard of no such complaint and have no information that will enable me to answer.

Mr. FESS. One told me that he not had pay for three months, and he wondered why that occurred.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know why an officer was without pay for three months. It is the only case of which I have ever heard of an officer being without pay for three months.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want information on another subject, if the chairman could give it to me. I listened to his statement objecting to the appointment of an advisory or regulatory congressional committee to attempt to investigate or control the executive departments. I agree with his position upon that matter, but there is an advisory committee authorized by legislation of Congress to advise the executives who have control of the conduct of war. I think it was first called the munitions board, and now its name is changed to the War Industries Board.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not a legislative committee.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is an advisory committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is part of the executive establishment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I observe that the largest item in this bill is for the Ordnance Department. In the expenditure of this vast sum of money the authority at present is with the Chief of Ordnance, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As I read the testimony of the chairman of the war industries board, Mr. Scott, before the gentleman's committee there was a question as to where final authority would lie. As I understood from that testimony, and I would like to have the opinion of the chairman, the final authority as to the disposition of this ordnance money is with the Chief of Ordnance and the recommendations of this advisory board are only recommendations and they have no authority to determine the actual expenditure of this money?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the theory; whether it is the fact I personally have some doubts. If the board were to make certain recommendations as to where contracts should be placed, unless there was some overwhelming reason that would be apparent to everyone why the Chief of Ordnance should disregard that recommendation and he placed it in another place, it is very apparent that he could never possibly justify his action if anything happened to delay the delivery of those materials in the event they were required. My opinion is that unless the recommendation of the board is so palpably irregular and improper the official would probably be compelled to follow the recommendation. I desire to say, however, so far as the committee could ascertain, those committees and those boards have been working in very close cooperation with the various bureaus. For instance, an ordnance officer is assigned to work with them and he supplies them with very considerable information that they could not otherwise obtain. I might add, and I should have said it, that the committee gave very considerable attention to the question of purchases and the methods and the terms of contracts and the operation of the advisory commission, the National Council of Defense, and the war-industries board. Any one who examines the hearings, I believe, will be convinced that the committee endeavored to obtain complete information upon the subject. I would not undertake to say that mistakes have not been made in the exercise of discretion, that some actions may not have been taken by those who exercised this discretion that others would differ from if in their place; but I have reached the conclusion that as a result of the cooperation of those different boards, although they may have made some mistakes, although some action may have been taken in a manner that some other individual in their place might have done in a different way, I reached the conclusion that their work has been of inestimable benefit to the Government; that our preparations for this war have been advanced in a manner that is impossible to describe, because of the cooperation which they have been able to give, and that those men, from patriotic and highly disinterested motives, have made very many and considerable sacrifices to help the Government. They have been subjected to a great deal of criticism that was unjust, and despite all of the difficulties that have surrounded the situation they have continued doing their work in a manner which entitles them to the commendation rather than the condemnation of the country at large.

That much should be said by me, because on several occasions when I differed somewhat radically with what had been done I did not hesitate to express my opinion, characterizing what I believed to be mistakes; and in the prosecution of these investigations I did not attempt in any way to act so as to avoid ruffling the feelings of any of those men if I believed it necessary to suggest questions to bring the information that I thought to be important. Perhaps I have been looked upon as a severe critic and a suspicious observer of their operations. Under those circumstances the least that can be said is what I have said. I believe that they have been patriotic and disinterested in contributing very materially to the work of the departments and in the preparation of the country for the great task before it, and if it had not been for their help and cooperation we would be very far from the condition of preparedness in which the country is at this time.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The question in particular that I wanted to bring out, if I could, was, If in constituting this advisory commission have we surrendered the power to that commission to determine the action of our executive department? It was brought out in the testimony that some of the heads of the departments practically admitted to your committee that they followed almost absolutely the findings of this board in their actions, apparently surrendering to that board the direction of their actions. I want to bring out, if I can, if it is your opinion, that there has been no surrender to this board of the power of final decision by the different heads of the executive departments or bureaus.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Do you refer to the board or to the Council of National Defense?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. This Council of National Defense.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is talking about the Advisory Commission?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has stated exactly the situation. In its practical working out, it may be the inevitable inference that it is impossible that they can exercise independent judgment, but when it is considered that all of those committees dealing with the various bureaus have been working in full cooperation and harmony, we think the situation is so understood.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two for information. Is this building up on the Belasco Theater corner going to be a permanent building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The proposed building is to be a permanent one.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And this one that they are going to erect down where the old station was is going to be temporary?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it contemplated to finally send the War Department and the Navy Department down there permanently?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. This is only to provide for that very extraordinary force, the employees who are required because of the emergency of this war. For instance, it is impossible to tell to what extent this service will grow. The munitions department of the British Government, which was created about a year or a year and a half after the war broke out, now has 8,000 employees in the city of London alone. And when it is considered that the Ordnance Department will expend in the neighborhood of more than $3,000,000,000 in this fiscal year, the force that will be required to handle, inspect, and audit the infinite multitude of details connected with it can not be anticipated. In The Adjutant General's office alone the number of clerks required increased so rapidly that before the committee had been able to act upon the requests of The Adjutant General for clerks he came back and stated that he had already employed that number and that a thousand or so more would be needed.

The Secretary of War spends about 16 hours a day in his office. They are working the clerks in two shifts. It has been stated that a great number of those clerks freely work additional time. The hours of employment have been extended. They run now from half past 8 a. m., I think, to 5 p. m., where formerly they worked from 9 o'clock a. m. until half past 4 p. m. And despite all those measures, with this enormous volume of work unexpectedly thrown upon the department that did not have the organization to handle it, there has been embarrassment and delay. The result of two months' investigation on this bill and of five or six weeks' investigation in connection with the previous emergency bill led me to believe that we have been remarkably fortunate in having accomplished what has been done, in view of the handicaps under which the departments labored. I did not enter upon those investigations with any bias in favor of the departments or with any desire to shield them if errors existed. I entered the investigation in the belief that the most effective service that the House could render would be, if it found errors, if it found inefficiency, if it found incapacity, not merely to make that the basis of criticism to embarrass, but to make it the basis of recommendations to eliminate inefficiency and incapacity. But, looking at the entire matter from that viewpoint, I am convinced, as I have already stated, and I believe that is the view of all who have been connected with the investigation, that the country is fortunate in having accomplished so much in the time and under the conditions that have existed since we entered the war.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman has indicated that the War Department recommends a very large estimate for the building of the camps for the National Guard, and that the item is not carried in the bill. Can the gentleman explain the difference in the character of the camps for the National Guard and the camps for the drafted men?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A cantonment is of a more permanent character. The men are housed in buildings—whereas in the National Guard encampment they are in tents—with buildings which provide accommodations that can be utilized during a period of three or four years. It is necessary to install a very much more extensive system of sewerage and watering and other things that add very materially to the cost.

Mr. SNOOK. It is contemplated, then, that the National Guard will not be in training so long in the camps?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And it was stated they would not be in them a sufficiently long period to require that permanent construction, and from the information that the committee had it believed they would not be required for the training of men in addition to the facilities that otherwise would exist after they ceased occupying them.

Mr. SNOOK. They are more of a temporary camp?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are more of a temporary camp.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. I am told that certain portions of the Aviation Division have been obliged, owing to the natural expansion of that branch, to move six times within the last six months, each time to larger quarters. Can the gentleman indicate whether the Aviation Section of the War Department will be housed in this new building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not. The space in the building is to be allotted by the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds upon the joint recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. The committee did not attempt in any way to control the heads of the departments in the location of the various bureaus of their respective departments.

Mr. GILLET. My recollection is that it appeared in the hearings that a new apartment house, which is just about being finished, had been taken for the aviation branch.

Mr. STAFFORD. As reference has been made to the apartment building at Fifteenth and M Streets, I wish to inquire whether it is planned that upon the completion of this temporary structure the Government will continue to occupy such buildings as the Hotel Gordon, which is occupied by the Food Conservation Commission, and this new apartment building, which is ill-suited, in my opinion, for office work, only two-thirds of the space, and that is a liberal estimate, being adapted to office purposes, because the building is divided into eight apartments to a floor, and each apartment has extensive bath arrangements, not available for Government clerks—whether those buildings will be surrendered at the completion of the temporary structure?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. The situation that confronted those who were charged with the administration of certain laws was that there was no office space to rent in the city of Washington. They had to obtain accommodations. Some old buildings that never were intended for office buildings were fitted up. The food administrator or director, as I understand, has taken the Gordon Hotel. Some one has rented an apartment house in course of construction. Efforts were made to locate space where employees could be put to do the work, and they could not be very particular about the character of the accommodations, since they were simply seeking to get accommodations that they could utilize.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the estimate of the gentleman of 800,000 feet needed for the Government activities at the present time include the space occupied by the Food Conservation Commission and these other activities?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The Food Conservation Commission was authorized to rent quarters out of the appropriations that were previously made.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Is it a fact that some have gone down to the Union Station?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have been unable to keep track of the journeyings of the aviation bureaus.

Mr. HICKS. The aviation section has flown around quite a little, has it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know, but I suppose they have shifted from place to place in order to obtain accommodations as the necessity of the service required.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wanted to ask why the recommendation of the Treasury Department for $750,000 for the United States Bureau of Employment was omitted from the bill. I think that is a very necessary item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state to the gentleman that the committee was not convinced of the necessity of it under the existing circumstances.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman knows there is a great demand for labor just now, especially in the shipyards. There are several over in Baltimore that want men and are unable to get them. Without funds the bureau is unable to get them for them. It seems to me this is a very important item if you want to carry on this shipbuilding program.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It depends on the view taken as to whether it is necessary to establish at this time a permanent employment bureau in the Government of the United States, when there is a greater demand for labor and a greater shortage of its supply than in any other time in our history. I have no doubt the service is doing valuable work; but, as I stated in the course of my remarks, the requests that were submitted to the Congress for money and the consideration of our financial situation were such that the committee did not recommend appropriations for any purposes that it was not convinced were absolutely imperative at this time. Desirable or useful or commendatory services which at other times would have received favorable consideration had to be eliminated, in view of the tremendous burdens we are about to ask the Congress to place upon the American people.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman realize the great necessity of bringing the workmen and the employers in contact with one another?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman ought not to attempt to cross-examine me about the item. I have stated the facts. If he has any views to express about the matter, he can do it in the course of debate; but I decline to stand here as a witness and be examined by anybody about a matter that is not in the bill after I have stated the reasons that actuated the committee. My personal views, elicited by this system of examination, would contribute no light or information that would be of use or value to the House.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman has no idea that I would put him on the stand as a witness when he has decided against it. I merely wished to show the necessity for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is asking questions evidently designed to elicit from me some statement that might be twisted or used later on in the course of the discussion of this matter. I have stated the facts and I have given the reasons that actuated the committee. If the matter is discussed later, I may discuss it more fully, but I do not wish to submit to an examination of that kind.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have a high regard for the gentleman's opinion. That is why I was asking him these questions, not to use them against him at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am frequently wrong, I admit, but I hope not intentionally.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I intended. I simply wish to express to my colleagues on the committee my very great appreciation of the disinterested and devoted manner in which they have labored during seven weeks of the hottest period of the summer in the preparation of this bill. The desire was to do this work in a manner that would satisfy the House that the moneys recommended were justified. We have furnished the House such information as the House should have regarding these various items, and that will enable the Members to form their own conclusions about questions of policy and the appropriations recommended. Those men who have so unselfishly and generously labored and cooperated with me not only have my sincere thanks, but they deserve the commendation of the House and of the country at large for their unselfish, disinterested, and valuable work in the preparation of this bill. [Applause.]

I shall insert a somewhat detailed statement of the appropriations which have been made and are pending now for the current fiscal year:

<sup>1</sup>This sum includes an appropriation of $10,000,000 for the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, which has been repealed by subsequent legislation.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy but a very few moments of the time of the House. A member of the minority on the committee is in a peculiar position just at present. It has been customary for years on these large appropriation bills for the ranking member of the minority to take that occasion, using the same figures that the majority member has in his statement, to draw from them deductions indicating whatever criticism he may find on the administration.

I myself in the past, with pain and regret, of course, have felt obliged at times to point out the delinquencies and extravagances of the administration. I think myself that that custom is wise. I think that it is well that the minority party should keep an eye out for the derelictions of the administration, and I think few administrations are so pure that they will not be benefited by a consciousness that there are alert and active critics who are on their trail. But I shall not now attempt to follow that useful custom. I feel that at present the one supreme purpose of both sides of the House is that this war shall be efficiently prosecuted; that we are all alike devoted to its success, and that it is not wise to try now to detract from the popularity and standing of the administration by pointing out what it has done which would be apt to lessen public confidence.

I do not mean that there has been no occasion. I will not pretend that there have not come before me facts which it seemed to me gave cause for criticism; cases of extravagance, cases of application of money and office for patronage purposes. But those are inevitable, and probably will always increase in such prodigal times as this, and I think it is wise to defer criticism until the duty which is now before us all to prosecute this war relentlessly is performed. [Applause.] I believe I shall best meet the wishes of the minority if I drop all partisanship toward the administration even if we meet no reciprocity. So I unite with the majority in approving this bill and making no criticisms upon what has transpired in the hearings. The chairman has given such an accurate and lucid statement of our financial position that I shall not repeat it or repeat his analysis of this bill. I was surprised at what he said about a committee on public expenditures. I did not know he was going to allude to it. I differ from him entirely in his attitude on that subject. What he read from the proceedings in the English Parliament was very interesting, but apparently even there, under the pressure of war, under the great power which an executive always grasps in war times and with enormous expenditures, even there it seems that the members of the House of Commons are jealous, not of an outside cabinet but of their own officers, and think they have too much power and wish to limit and restrict them. Now, in the committee on expenditures which has been suggested here, there was not any attempt, as I understand it, to make a coexecutive body. There was not the purpose, nor I believe the desire, to hamper the administration. I confess it seemed to me the President, with all respect, was oversensitive upon the subject. My understanding of its purpose was that now, with these gigantic appropriations, it is impossible for the House to scrutinize them thoroughly as we make the appropriations. I think those of us on this committee will admit that with our two months' careful and close investigation we can not plume ourselves that we have gone to the bottom of these appropriations.

In fact, many of the heads of bureaus and departments that came before us themselves could not go to the bottom. The enormous demands came upon them and upon us so suddenly that a great deal of their estimates and a great deal of our conclusions is largely guesswork. Therefore under those conditions it seemed wise that there should be a committee of the House on expenditures, which should cooperate with the administration, and as the expenditures were made have an insight and knowledge about them. It could not be a partisan committee, because it would be of the same complexion as the administration. It was simply, in my view, one attempt to hold onto the power of Congress. Always in case of war, where this enormous patronage and these enormous expenditures are put into the hands of the Executive, the Congress necessarily must lose power. This House is constantly nowadays diminishing in importance compared with the Executive. And it seemed to me this was a wise endeavor somewhat to redress the balance, and to reinvest us with the power which we ought to have. When the Secretary of the Treasury was given the enormous power to issue to the nations of the world $4,000,000,000 in bonds I suggested then that that power which was given to the Secretary, subject to the revision of the President, ought also to be subject to the revision of a small committee of Congress. It struck me that there was an occasion where no man ought to feel affronted if we said, "We should know something of the reasons which influence you before you give half a billion to that nation and half a billion to another." It seemed to me that was not an undue assumption of the power and control of Congress to say that in these enormous loans to foreign nations, Congress, which provides the money, ought to have knowledge and some power over its distribution, and should have a right to pass with the Secretary upon the question as to what nations the loans should be made to. But the majority party in the House was unwilling that this should be considered. So, as I say, it seems to me that in these war times it is not asking too much that Congress should maintain, as far as possible, its powers, and a committee on expenditures seems to me a reasonable, harmless, and wise attempt to accomplish it.

Now, in the hearings on this bill, which I agree with the chairman have been as exhaustive as possible, we did not pretend—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Before the gentleman leaves that subject will he yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I drew the conclusion from the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. FITZGERALD] that he thought the Committee on Appropriations really should take the place of the contemplated committee to supervise the expenditures during the conduct of the war. Now, did the Committee on Appropriations make inquiry into expenditures that might be deemed unwise or profligate?

Mr. GILLETT. Do you mean expenditures already made?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Why, in a certain measure we inquired about what had been done as a step to whether we should give further appropriations along those lines.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For instance, much information comes in from different quarters of the country that profligate expenditures attend the establishment of these cantonments and camps. Probably the price to be paid is cost and 10 per cent profit to the contractor, and that the cost of the establishment or camp is enormously increased in order that the 10 per cent will amount to a considerable sum.

Mr. GILLETT. We asked the heads of departments about that. Of course we did not go—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Criticism is coming in quietly—not in the newspapers. There is no disposition to hamper or throw anything in the way of the administration, but there is criticism upon the manner in which money is being expended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, if he will read the hearings had on that particular question, he will find out that a large amount of misinformation is coming in. He will get the details of the contracts, and I think he will be convinced that a considerable amount of misinformation has been circulated that is not justified.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have procured a copy of the hearings.

Mr. GILLETT. I am disposed to agree with the chairman of the committee in that statement. As indicating how impossible it is to go to the root of things, take this very bill, in which we authorize an enormous lump sum. For the first time that I know of the Appropriations Committee have authorized a lump sum of $100,000,000 for the Secretary of War to apply to contracts; and I think it is wise, because we recognize that in these times it is impossible for us to foresee and impossible for the department to foresee far enough in advance so that we can investigate beforehand. Therefore we must trust it to them entirely if there is no committee on expenditures.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I observe also that there is a lump appropriation of $700,000,000 to make contracts for ammunition.

Mr. GILLETT. We had details as to what that was for; but this $100,000,000 is just for anything that may come up which we do not know about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is confined, however, to ordnance.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; it is confined to ordnance.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. With reference to the expenditures of money on these various fields, is there any latitude at all above the written contract?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know to what the gentleman refers.

Mr. FESS. Suppose the contractor has not been able to get help.

Mr. GILLETT. Is the gentleman speaking about the cantonments?

Mr. FESS. Cantonments and the aviation field. Suppose he has not been able to get help. Has he not the latitude to say we will give you so much beyond what is written in the contract?

Mr. GILLETT. The contract does not specify what he shall pay for help.

Mr. FESS. The chairman said that there was a good deal of misinformation coming in. I want to say that there is an immense amount of waste in these fields that anybody can see if he stands and looks a little while. It goes way above the estimates, and when the bill comes in here, will it be taken care of and virtual consent be given to the overcharge?

Mr. GILLETT. There will not be any overcharge; none of them are under any contract price; they are all to be paid expenses plus a percentage.

Mr. FESS. I know the contractor in one field, that said he had gone a half a million dollars above the estimate.

Mr. GILLET. Yes; above the estimate.

Mr. FESS. And he was greatly disturbed about what would take place, due to the fact that there was a good deal of talk about the immense waste of labor that could not be utilized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was the increased expense that he had to go to? The gentleman says he went half a million dollars beyond the estimate. Why did it cost half a million dollars more—because he was compelled to pay more for labor?

Mr. FESS. Yes; he was paying $8.25 a day for teams, and he had 511 teams.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How could he help it?

Mr. FESS. That is the question I am asking.

Mr. GILLET. There is no limit to the price for labor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Except they endeavored to keep the contract. The cantonments have been put in places where there was no great surplus of labor, and in order to get it they had to be diverted from occupations already engaged in, and higher prices had to be paid than ordinarily would be required, and, of course, it has increased the cost.

Mr. FESS. That was the argument—that they had to pay in order to get them. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit a further interruption, the party to whom I referred was considerably disturbed about his inability to do the work in the time that it was thought it could be done and in which it was specified it would be done.

Here is a group of labor over here in the officers' quarters, and another group over here on the hangars, and another group on the buildings for the machine and repair shop. He was urged to hold the labor, so as to finish it all and settle it at once, but the trouble was he would have a lot of labor on his hands unemployed, and he was disturbed about it and was concerned that there might be some trouble given him in Congress in getting the money under the contract, but he thought he was justified to try to carry out the contract even at that great expense.

Mr. GILLET. It will be for the department to pass on his contract.

Mr. FESS. It seems to me that it might have been justifiable, since we may not have had any other way; but there certainly is an enormous waste going on, which anybody can see who will stand and look at the performance.

Mr. GILLET. Unquestionably there is, and unquestionably there always is a waste in Government activities, and when there is suddenly precipitated upon us the necessity of doing these enormous pieces of work for which we are unprepared, of course the waste is far greater than ever. I have no doubt by the contractors and upon Government work there will during the first year be an enormous waste, and I expect it would be so even in autocratic governments.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLET. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Apropos to this discussion as to efficiency and economy, although it may not be pertinent, I want to ask the gentleman a question. I have been informed that the aviation work of the Government is being performed at this time through two departments—that is, that the aviation work of the Army is being done by the Signal Corps, and the aviation work of the Navy is being done from an aviation section in the Navy Department. Now, are they conducting their work separately and without any harmony and cooperation?

Mr. GILLET. I think not without harmony and cooperation. They are conducting it separately, it is true. I remember that we asked a representative of the Navy about that, and I remember his saying that their needs were so different from the Army that it was essential to have a different plant.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why, along the lines of economy, could not some legislation be enacted which would combine the various activities under one bureau so that they will be under one head?

Mr. GILLET. That very question was asked the head of the Navy, and we were told that their needs were so different from the needs of the Army that it was not possible.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman will recall that there is a single body where all the plans of both Army and Navy in aviation work are being worked out, and they are working in complete cooperation through a central body.

Mr. GILLET. That is for machines.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; beyond that. The whole matter is being discussed through a board, on which are Army and Navy representatives, and which is bringing out these matters and determining them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I was asking for information; and if there is not such a body, there ought to be.

Mr. GILLET. I simply wish to say, in addition, that whatever I may think of partisanship in this administration—and I confess it does seem to me that our endeavor to put aside partisanship does not meet with much appreciation there—I am happy to say that in the Committee on Appropriations there has not been the slightest lack of entire harmony and cooperation. During my service there there has been less liability to partisan contests than on most of the committees, but certainly during the last two months when this subcommittee has been at work the minority has been treated by the majority with just as much consideration and apparently its opinions given just as much weight as if there were no distinction of party. Our decisions have been harmonious. While, of course, they have not been unanimous, and while this bill probably does not represent the views of the chairman or of any other single member of the committee, yet for myself I am glad to say that I can heartily indorse it, and I believe that it has been conscientiously and carefully studied and prepared, that it is as good a result as we could expect, and that throughout the deliberations there has been apparently no consciousness that we belonged to different parties. The problems before us were so stupendous that they seemed to dwarf and stifle small and selfish considerations. We were all unitedly trying to do the best we could do for the United States and to bring out the best bill possible, and this enormous sum of $4,000,000,000 represents the best judgment of all of the combined membership of the committee. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FERRIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANDELL, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. FERNALD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, events have shown beyond doubt that the only great nation in the world prepared for war in August, 1914, was the Empire of Germany. For half a century that country had been developing military science to the highest point of efficiency. Universal military training had made its man power available for immediate action. In the manufacture of artillery and other munitions it excelled the world. It was the gun merchant of the globe, and the Krupp cannon and Mauser rifles had made it the profit taker of every war. All of the auxiliaries which would aid in offense and defense had been carefully tended. Highways, bridges, fortifications, maps, the location of its railways, the condition of its rivers and harbors, and even its economic and trade arrangements had been carefully designed to free it as far as possible from dependence upon other nations and make it all-sufficient and self-sustaining when the hour struck for it to treat all treaties as mere scraps of paper. The United States, on the contrary, was of all the great nations of the world the least prepared for war of any great nation which has successfully maintained an independent existence.

Germany is a nation of less than 70,000,000 people, inhabiting a country of comparatively small extent and of limited resources. The United States is a nation of a hundred million, inhabiting a vast stretch of territory, with every variety of climate and soil, and with a wealth of resources hardly estimated. The population of the United States is fully as intelligent, resolute, and skillful as that of Germany. It is manifest that aside from the marvelous preparation which Germany had had, this country, single-handed, would have been more than its equal in any national conflict.

When the feudal autocracy of Germany felt that the hour had come when it was strong enough to make war upon civilization, in the dispensation of Providence the blow did not fall upon our country first. If it had, appalling damage and suffering would have followed before the equilibrium could have been restored. We had the advantage of seeing other nations first hurried into the struggle and reading in the record of their trials and failures the plain sentence of our own national duty. I will not stop to inquire who, if anyone, was to blame for our national flabbiness. The fact is, we had an Army of less than a hundred thousand men, too small to police even our short international border on the Rio Grande. This Army had been allowed to grow in cost as it diminished in relative size and value, until the little Army of a hundred thousand men was costing us annually 50 per cent as much as the 5,000,000 armed defenders of Germany.

We had a Navy which had also been provided with funds more liberally than that of any other nation except England, the mistress of the sea, and yet it was said that our Navy was fourth or fifth in national rank and could not protect either the Atlantic or Pacific coasts. None of our economic conditions had been adjusted to the full poise and power of a vigorous and self-reliant nation. We were a debtor nation. Millions of our securities were held abroad and we must send annually our tribute to meet the interest of this indebtedness. If we could not pay in cash, we must send raw material at the lowest competitive price, draining our national resources to support the labor and capital of Europe.

We had no merchant marine. The Stars and Stripes had almost disappeared from the oceans of the world. The export trade upon which we depended to pay our foreign obligations was carried on in alien ships. The neutral markets of the world were closed to us except so far as we could serve as hewers of wood and drawers of water for our commercial masters in Europe. Marine insurance was a foreign monopoly, and our system of finance and currency gave way under every strain.

The strength of the giant was here, but he must be aroused from his indolence and lethargy, first, by a sense of danger, and then by the pride of accomplishment. The world conflict had been raging two full years before we had gotten past the point of discussing whether the National Army of a hundred million people should have 175,000 or 200,000 men. We had not awakened to the thought that every free man of military age is part of his country's defense. So overgrown in provincialism had we become and so inured to the shame of commercial nakedness that we did not realize that commerce upon the high seas, with its opportunity for free outlet of all the products of a people's energy and skill, is the very lifeblood of a nation, and that a nation that can not protect its commerce can not protect itself. Fortunately, some of the foundation stones for national reconstruction had been laid.

The Federal reserve bank act had secured to us financial strength and independence. The Shipping Board had been created and had entered in a hasty way upon the task of restoring the merchant marine. The Tariff Board had been provided to study intelligently economic problems in their relation to foreign trade, but the physical strength of the Nation was still dormant.

By the act of August 29, 1916, making appropriations for the support of the Army the first important step was taken in the creation of a Council of National Defense. This might have proved an opportunity merely for the appointment of useless officers or it might, as it did, prove, in the hands of a firm, far-seeing, and earnest President, a shining weapon of national honor.

When, in February, 1917, the Imperial Government of Germany threw off all masks and pretenses and boldly announced that it would sink all ships upon the ocean without mercy and without warning; when it became necessary for the President to declare to Congress that that Government in violating its repeated pledges to respect the rights of neutrals and the mandates of international law had declared war upon civilization, and when the supreme issue was drawn whether the world should be made free for democracy or whether it should be kept safe for the Hohenzollerns, it is a matter of national pride that we were not so unprepared—at least, in plan and purpose—as our enemy might hope and wish. The American conscience had been touched, the American spirit aroused, and it remained only for America to pull itself together and gird up its loins to test again the question whether a democracy can endure.

War was declared by Congress upon the Imperial Government of Germany on the 5th day of April, 1917. More than five months have elapsed since then. No effective blow has been struck at the enemy, but with what sureness of touch and resistless energy the great problems have been met and solved! The Council of National Defense, really a committee of the President's Cabinet, called to its aid some of the best product of the American business and industrial world as an advisory council. The work to be done was to create an Army worthy to be sent against the forces of Germany and its allies. This Army must be fully furnished and equipped with arms and munitions which would enable it to cope successfully with the best that science had placed in the hands of the enemy. It must be supplied with clothing, shelter, food, transportation, and medical facilities. The derangement of industry caused by the transfer of large numbers of men from civil to military life must be minimized, the congestion of transportation avoided, the scandals of Government contracts caused by the sudden calling for enormous supplies must not occur, a check must be put to the rapid and inordinate rise in prices of the necessities of life, the civil population and those engaged in the productive industries of the country must be made secure, a sufficiency of food, fuel, and clothing obtained, and the production of the Nation must be stimulated and greater efficiency brought about.

I wish it were possible for me to grasp, let alone to expound, all of the various plans and projects which grew so rapidly under the skillful touch of this great patriotic committee. I can only cast a few high lights upon the subject. We know that the first result of war in every age and in all countries has been to send the prices of necessities of life suddenly upward out of the reach of the great masses, and that nameless horrors fall upon the industrious poor. We know that the opportunity for profit and the temptation to take advantage of human need arouses the worst passions of the sordid and unpatriotic. We know that the mere fact that the Government itself is in the market for large supplies increases the price and removes those common necessities from the reach of the laboring man.

Most Governments have looked upon this question coldly, matching the life of a government or of a dynasty against the life of a poor peasant; but democracy must approach the problem from a different point. To democracy the life, the happiness, and the opportunities of the humblest of its citizens are equal to those of its greatest.

Take another angle. All Governments, our own included, have been shamelessly and unmercifully robbed in the contracts made to supply its imperative needs during the time of national danger. In this war we must have no extortion by profiteers against the Government. Both the Government and the public must be protected from extortionate and unreasonable prices. We start with the plain fact that this country is able to produce all that the Government needs, all that its own population needs, and a substantial surplus to be furnished to our allies and neutral nations abroad. The only solution of the problem is to measure the full visible supply into the real needs, tempered by economy and prudence. If the demand be great and the supply limited, then the problem becomes one of the stimulation of production. Until such stimulation occurs an honest and unavoidable increase in price prevails, but all extortionate prices either to the Nation or its people, founded upon greed, speculation, or profiteering, must be rigidly curbed by the united power of the Nation.

To the honor and credit of our country be it said that no nation has ever met this inevitable problem, which lies at the very threshold of war, with a greater spirit of devotion and loyalty and with more unqualified success than our country has met it. The Council of National Defense called to its aid scores of the most successful business men of the land, who contribute their brains, their skill, and their energy in this hour of the Nation's need, not only without remuneration but with the actual loss of their own business and opportunities, and with an added expense out of their own pockets.

Subcommittees under the committees of the Council of National Defense were formed upon all of the principal branches of industry. In the hands of these men the specifications and requirements of the War Department and of the Navy—most of which had become archaic and wasteful—were revised and modernized. These men told us how to avoid enhancing the price of the needed articles by competition of one department against another or among several Government contractors. They showed us how to marshal the full assets of the Nation in such commodities as were needed in extraordinary quantities, and where the supply was not equal to the demand to find serviceable substitutes therefor. They brought the producers and manufacturers of the great staples needed into actual contact with the Government—in many cases by voluntary action, and in other cases by the pressure of commercial conditions or by public opinion—but in the last analysis by the latent powers of the Government itself prices were kept down to a reasonable basis. They pointed the way for legislation to safeguard the interests of the public and the consuming masses of the population so that a full supply of the real necessities of life might be within the reach of the workers at prices commensurate with their wages.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman from Missouri know whether there is any foundation at all for the statement in the papers this morning that there is a trust controlling the aeroplanes and that a combination has been formed by which all makers of aeroplanes who sell them to the Government must pay $1,000 for each machine to this combine?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that statement in the newspapers is well founded. All of the information which came before our committee indicated that the manufacture of aeroplanes and motors and parts therefor had already been correlated by this aerial navigation board and that they had impounded practically the manufacturing facilities of the country. The board has combined in some cases the manufacture of motors for automobiles with the manufacture of motors for aeroplanes, and has thus commandeered or impounded or correlated all possible sources of the manufacture of aeroplanes. I think they have the subject matter under full control. Not only that, but as I understand it, they have a pretty full inventory of the available supply of spruce and of other articles entering into the construction of these machines. They know where it is, how available it is for transportation, and how cheaply it can be gotten out. They have assembled, in other words, the maximum assets for the production of aeroplanes, because the needs of the Government are going to demand the maximum production.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I notice the morning papers state that no contracts have been let for fighting machines up to this time. Does the gentleman know about that?

Mr. BORLAND. I think that is true. The type of machines being used is what is known as school machines. Our American machines were not developed to the latest models, although the aeroplane is an American invention. We had not pursued its development as far as it has been pursued abroad. Our machines are of the slower variety and the smaller variety. They are not the large, the heavy, or the fast machines.

Mr. MAPES. Have we the plans and specifications on hand preparatory for letting contracts for fighting machines?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; we have. I can say that without violating any confidence of the committee. There has been full correspondence between all of the allied Governments engaged in this war in regard to the highest and best type of fighting machines, and when the time comes, when we arrange for entering upon the manufacture of that type of machine, we will enter upon it fully equipped with the very best plans that our allies have.

I have no doubt it is possible for gentlemen to point out now, and hereafter it will be possible for them with the advantage of retrospect to point out with more success, alleged mistakes, failures, blunders, and oversights of the administration and of its aids under the Council of National Defense. I doubt not that some insinuations may be made and the cynical finger of suspicion pointed at some of their acts. It would be unusual if we could go through even the smallest war free from the breath of scandal. But in all fairness let it be said that the firm grappling with these problems has saved the Nation, and especially the industries of our people, untold suffering. The credit balance is already so large that I am almost willing to let them charge what they will in the debit column.

Upon the Shipping Board, newly created, fell also the full burden of this responsibility. A large measure of the commercial shipping of the world disappeared from the sea as a direct result of the war. First, the German vessels were swept away and the great tonnage formerly carried by the Hamburg-American and the North German Lloyd was left without facilities. Next the shipping of the belligerent countries, England and her allies, was largely commandeered for the purpose of those Governments and for the transportation of troops and supplies, and this withdrew it from the service of neutral nations, such as our own. Then the ruthless submarine warfare of Germany has destroyed—in most cases in sheer wantonness and without any possible military advantage—thousands of tons of shipping, both of the belligerent and neutral countries. This form of piracy is still violent. Each week was the shipping of the world depleted, and the wanton destruction of life and property still goes on.

One of the tremendous problems for America to solve is to replace the world shipping, and ultimately to own it and to dominate and become the carrying power of the globe. The Shipping Board has organized the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and is busily engaged in buying, building, and contracting for ships of all kinds, quality, and character. We must not only replace the shipping which has been lost; we must also provide for carrying supplies to the belligerent countries abroad, for the natural outlet for our own commerce and our surplus productions, and for all trade of neutral nations.

In addition to this, in order to meet the enemy that we fight, we must transport our troops and their supplies to the fighting front. Here again a problem looms so large that nothing like it has ever confronted the human mind since the dawn of history; but America can solve it, and will emerge from the test the greatest among the maritime nations of the world.

Yet many more problems present themselves in the evolution of modern science as applied to warfare. Motor transportation in these days has taken the place of the Army mule, and American ingenuity must supply the very latest and best of motor trucks, combining a triumph of mechanical skill and military efficiency. The submarine has introduced a problem for us to solve, and light, fast submarine destroyers are being equipped and sent to sea like a swarm of hornets. Submarine bases are under construction at strategic points on our coasts; our offshore points of importance are being patrolled night and day, and every gate is guarded.

Possibly the battle may shift from beneath the seas to the vaulted dome of heaven, and the aeroplane must be brought to a perfection of speed and efficiency scarcely dreamed of. This most modern of all inventions, American by birth, has under the lash of war found its highest development abroad. We Americans have been left far behind in the improvement of aerial navigation. We can, however, with our skill and ingenuity, with our capital and our intelligent labor, overtake all foreign developments on the subject and go far beyond them, leaving competitors in the rear.

In all of these matters we can not afford to approach the question from the standpoint of what will just barely answer for the emergency. We must have the best, the quickest, the strongest, and the most effective. We must excel the enemy in the accuracy of our plans, the sureness of their execution, and the sharpness of our weapons. It will not do to lag behind him or try simply to keep even with him. To win we must excel, for we are matching ourselves against an enemy who has followed this principle in his preparation for this struggle.

According to my belief, the essential thing in war is preparedness. We must have all that is necessary, at the right place, at the right time, or sooner if possible. If our forces are not sent to the front sufficient in number, sufficiently equipped, sufficiently supported, we had better not send them at all. Let men criticize and grow impatient as they will, the last argument to the world is success. In my thought three things are important: First, that we have what is needed at the right time; second, that it be of the best quality that we can procure; and, third, that it cost as reasonable a price as possible. These essentials bear a relative importance exactly in the order stated.

While I am not in the confidence of the Council of National Defense or any of its boards, I read upon the face of their action the application of these principles.

As the executive has pursued its plans through its chosen aids, the legislative branch of the Government has cooperated in the most energetic and effective manner, and with but few obscure exceptions with the most devoted loyalty. Congress assembled in extraordinary session and passed the declaration of war April 5, 1917. I wish I could give even a fragmentary glimpse into the tremendous labors of the congressional body during this extraordinary session. A recital of what has been done and what laws have been placed upon the statute books will throw but a feeble light upon the extent of the work. On April 17 the deficiency appropriation bill became a law. On April 24 the bill to authorize the issuance of $5,000,000,000 of bonds and $2,000,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness—the largest bond issue until then ever proposed by any country—was passed. This measure provided for extending credit to foreign Governments engaged with us in this war to the amount of $3,000,000,000 for the purpose of enabling them to more efficiently and actively prosecute the war. Under this authority much of the credit which has been given to foreign Governments has been used for the purchase of supplies from the manufacturers and producers in the United States, and little if any of the real cash has left our own shores. And yet it has extended substantial aid to our allies, has strengthened their hands and upheld them against the time when our forces could be on the firing line, and has made us as a Nation the financial reservoir of the civilized world.

On May 12, 1917, the Army appropriation bill was approved, providing for the support of the increased forces and for the National Guard. On May 18, 1917, the whole military policy of the United States was remodeled and made universal and democratic by the draft or conscription law. It was an amazing spectacle to see such a great country as ours, composed of so many elements and peopled by immigrants from every country under the sun, adopt, with so little friction and opposition, a system of placing a share of the burden of national defense upon the shoulders of every free man of qualified age. It was a triumph of democracy, intelligence, and patriotism. History records no case where any nation by voluntary act of its citizens has undertaken so large and important a step, and the manner in which it was responded to by the people is a splendid answer to the critics of democracy.

On May 22, 1917, an increase was made in the personnel of the Navy, more than doubling our effective fighting force. With the first week of June came the registration of the qualified men under the conscription act, and nearly 10,000,000 young Americans stepped forward to enroll the same day. By the sundry civil appropriation act of June 12, 1917, enlargements and increases were provided in all of the manufacturing arsenals of the Government. Provision was made for the erection of buildings, the installation of machinery and equipment for the making of artillery, small arms, cartridges, powder, belts, knapsacks, canteens, and camp supplies, thus making Uncle Sam as far as possible independent of manufacturers and contractors and taking the profits out of war. Men have said that war is only encouraged by those engaged in the business of supplying the munitions of war. But we determined that so far as was possible the Government should supply itself from its own manufacturing establishments and destroy both the profits and the pressure for war.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield.

Mr. NORTON. Of the amount that is to be expended for war supplies during the present fiscal year, can the gentleman say as to what percentage of those supplies are to be manufactured by the Government and what percentage by private enterprise?

Mr. BORLAND. No. I think it would be very interesting to give the percentage, but I have not the figures at hand. As a matter of fact, the percentage to be manufactured by the Government is very much smaller than the percentage to be manufactured by private manufactories.

Mr. NORTON. Is the amount to be manufactured by the Government as much as 10 per cent?

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, yes; in almost every line it is as much as 10 per cent, and in powder it is much more than 10 per cent. It is enough. I will say to the gentleman to control practically in a very material way the price, because the Government is fully armed now with exact details of the cost of production of these munitions that it needs. As to other supplies, such as lumber and fabrics, and things of that kind, it is not so armed; but as to munitions, shells, field artillery, small arms, cartridges, and so on, the Government is fully armed with a very concise, detailed knowledge of the cost of production, by reason of the fact that it makes such articles in its own arsenals.

Mr. NORTON. We recently appropriated more than $600,000,000 for aeroplanes and aviation. Is the Government manufacturing any aeroplanes on its own account?

Mr. BORLAND. The Government is not directly manufacturing aeroplanes, no, and it never manufactured any in its own Government arsenals. On the aeroplane features spoken of here a while ago we are still in the experimental stage. There is no standardization of aeroplanes. We are reaching out to create facilities for the manufacture of aeroplanes.

Mr. NORTON. I am making inquiry for this reason. The statement the gentleman has been making in his speech would give the impression that the Government is going quite extensively into the manufacture of its own war supplies.

Mr. BORLAND. That is correct.

Mr. NORTON. If it is not going in any more than to the extent of 10 per cent, I do not think the gentleman's position is well taken. This administration will have to do a great deal more than it has done so far during this war to be justly entitled to any credit for economy or for eliminating the huge profits in war supplies many great corporations are making.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman takes a different view from what I do. All of the sudden demands of this war can not be supplied from the Government arsenals. If the Government goes in to the extent of 10 per cent, I would say, if the gentleman had all the information before him, he would see that it controlled very largely the price which the Government has to pay if it has to buy from the manufacturers. As to staple supplies—harness, equipment of all kinds for cavalry and infantry, field artillery, mountain artillery, coast artillery, guns, shells, explosive torpedoes, and so on—all those things are standardized, and the Government has complete information as to the cost of manufacture, and does not let contracts in excess of that cost. It has complete control of the situation.

Mr. NORTON. Take the one item of gas masks. Does the gentleman know what exorbitant prices the Government is being charged for these?

Mr. BORLAND. Let me finish—and that control that the Government has is due to the enlargement of the Government arsenals, which I trust the gentleman is in favor of.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman is very much in favor of the Government manufacturing a great deal more of its needed war supplies than it is now doing.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, for experimental things, such as gas masks and things like that, there is still a question as to how much they shall be purchased for and whether they can be made cheaper by improved methods.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question right in line with that?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I noticed, in yesterday's paper I think, the Secretary of War had given out a dispatch about a new standard engine which had been developed for the aeroplane. Is that to be manufactured by the Government or by private enterprise?

Mr. BORLAND. No; the Government, in its manufacturing arsenals, does not manufacture any portion of an aeroplane. These new types are being created by a correlation of private industry and Government control.

Mr. FESS. I understood that the plan is to have different parts of an aeroplane manufactured at different places so that one institution just manufactures one part and another another—

Mr. BORLAND. That is true.

Mr. FESS (continuing). In order to get a great accumulation very soon.

Mr. BORLAND. That is true. The manufacture of the aeroplane is divided up among several plants and the parts are assembled in assembling plants. The wings and body of the aeroplane can easily be made almost anywhere, but the engine is the important part and must be made in the establishment manufacturing the motor engine.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit there, at the Wilbur Wright field they are building now a concrete building as an assembling plant, 450 feet wide and 900 feet long, simply for assembling.

Mr. BORLAND. There has been a great extension in the last few months in those facilities in this country for the manufacture of aeroplanes. I remember when we had up the sundry civil bill in May we were discussing this same question, and then the maximum capacity of aeroplanes in this country was little above 3,000 in 12 months. It is vastly greater than that now. I would not undertake to say what it was, but with the application of skill and thought to the problem and with the correlating of different establishments our facilities have been greatly increased in the production of that material.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. REED. The gentleman's discourse is very illuminating, and I want to ask if he will address himself to the question as to whether in our country's preparation we are taking into consideration the special facilities of England and France or any of the other allies for producing some things with which they could supply while we might be able to supply them with something else which we are much better equipped to produce or manufacture here?

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman mean as to aeroplanes particularly or as to munitions?

Mr. REED. Munitions. Are we cooperating?

Mr. BORLAND. On munitions we are cooperating with them to a considerable extent. On aeroplanes, as I said a few moments ago about the question of plans and question of assembling, I think still more. We will ship abroad knocked-down parts for aeroplanes and have them assembled abroad.

At this particular point I might mention, to illustrate the thing to the gentleman, that when this war broke out we had, as he well knows, about 800,000 Springfield rifles. We regard the Springfield as the best rifle. It shoots farthest and shoots with most force. We had about 300,000 of the old Krag-Jorgensens, that we did not care to use because we did not care to continue that type. Those Krags have been largely distributed to home guards and State organizations that will do local work, or have been sent to the colonies. The 800,000 Springfields, of course, were in the hands of the Regular Army.

The question came upon the production of a largely increased quantity of new rifles. It was found that the manufacturing concerns of this country were fully equipped with the machines to make the Enfield, or British, rifle, and that by a slight change of the chambering of the rifle they could be adapted to American ammunition. In my judgment there was some doubt as to whether they ought to be changed to adopt the Springfield ammunition. I think we ought to drop the Springfield rifle altogether, so as to be uniform with the British Army in both rifle and ammunition. But it seems the machine guns use the same ammunition as our rifles, and therefore it was better to maintain the standard of ammunition.

We are now engaged in taking over a large number of those British contracts made with American manufacturers for the production of Enfield rifles. The gentleman will find in the hearings a very interesting statement of how we acquired the facilities for this manufacture so as to be able to supply our need for increased numbers of rifles promptly. The British Government put in the machinery to manufacture Enfield rifles because the manufacturers would not buy the machinery. So the British Government put $20,000,000 worth of machinery into American factories. We are going to fall heir to that machinery for less than fifty cents on the dollar, and then we are going to adapt it to Enfield rifles for our Army, with the chambering changed to suit ammunition. That is one of the circumstances that might be given as to the cooperation now occurring.

Mr. REED. The gentleman will recall that when the war broke out Germany astonished the world by those powerful siege guns that knocked down fortifications that were supposed to be absolutely impregnable. Now, are we going into the manufacture of guns equal to or superior to the great German guns? If we proceed with the allies toward Berlin, we will most certainly have to encounter strong fortifications requiring for the Army the mightiest guns that science can provide.

Mr. BORLAND. That is a matter I do not feel qualified to discuss, and the gentleman will see that we should not discuss it, even if our plans were better formed than they are. It is sufficient to say that the plans of the British for heavy siege artillery are fully at our command. The gentleman recognizes, I am sure, that this is the only answer that can be given to his question in the present state of public affairs.

June 15, 1917, the so-called espionage bill became a law, providing for the enforcement of neutrality, the protection of commerce, and the suppression of treason, latent and active. Under this bill there has been created in the last few days an Export Board to determine how much of the necessities of life can be safely exported from this country, and how much of that exportation shall be directed toward the belligerent countries allied with us in this country and how much can be safely sent to neutral countries. As is well known, there are some neutral countries adjacent to our enemy's lines whose position is such that there is grave danger that supplies sent to their ports may find their way into the enemy's lines to the support of the enemy himself. All these doors must be closed and no advantage taken of the generosity or good nature of Uncle Sam.

On the same day the urgent deficiency appropriation bill was enacted, still further providing for the national expenditures. On June 21 amendments were made to the Federal reserve banking act designed to enable the small banks and the State banks to align themselves with the great national system and provide a broader and firmer basis for the national credit. On July 28, 1917, the law was passed, providing that entrymen upon Government land and other homesteaders who entered the Army should not lose their homestead rights.

In the first week of August the two great food-control bills became laws. The larger one provided for the control by the Government over food, feed, and fuel, and was relentlessly fought by the special interests and selfish exploiters who hoped to wring profit from the distress of the people during the coming winter. The companion bill was the food-survey bill, under which the Secretary of Agriculture will take an accurate and practical inventory of all the food supplies of the Nation, so that, like the thrifty farmer, we may know as winter approaches how much we have stored up in the cellar. Already the beneficial effect of these acts has been seen in the firm control which has been exercised over the price of fuel for domestic use.

The House has passed, and there is now pending in the Senate, a bill to prevent trading with the enemy and the second bond bill, providing $7,000,000,000. The soldier and his family have not been forgotten, for Congress is at work upon an extension of the war-risk program. We found it necessary early in the war to provide a bureau of war risk for marine insurance to encourage the movement of our products and prevent stagnation of our trade by providing indemnity for losses at sea. If we can apply that principle to our goods, we can apply it to our soldiers. Congress therefore proposes to give the soldiers ample insurance or an allowance to the families and dependents while the breadwinner is serving his country. It adds to that an indemnity or compensation for injury or death in the service similar to but much more prompt and effective than the old pension system. It adds also voluntary insurance in which the Government carries the greater part of the risk, and the cost to the soldier is nominal. By means of this he can provide additional indemnity where his obligations, moral or legal, are heavier than those provided for in the ordinary compensation act.

Nothing could have exceeded the unanimity with which the American public took hold of the liberty-bond loan and oversubscribed the first issue of $2,000,000,000 by more than 50 per cent. This not only shows the united spirit of the people and their deep devotion to the purpose of this war, but it shows a well-founded confidence in their Government. The same result was reached when the heart strings were touched by the appeal of the Red Cross. The conservatives gravely shook their heads when the Red Cross asked for a hundred million from the American people and said that, with all the burdens now upon them, the people could not respond. But they did respond to the amount of a hundred and twenty-five million before the subscriptions stopped coming in.

No more notable problem ever confronts any nation than securing the revenue and sinews of war under the extreme circumstances of national peril. It has become necessary for this Congress to impose the most extraordinary taxes ever imposed upon any nation in the history of the world. It is well that this is done by the deliberate voice of the representatives of a free people. The tax is the touchstone of national power. If a nation will pay taxes, and especially by its own voice and its own vote, that nation is strong, united, and unconquerable. This Nation is preparing to pay taxes amounting in a single year to two and a half billion dollars, but those taxes are being very wisely laid. We have laid them upon excess profits, large incomes, and other sources which do not demoralize business, which do not destroy any man's industry, and which do not kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. The country will continue to prosper and its industries to thrive in spite of this extraordinary taxation. I have no hesitation in conscripting wealth for the defense of the country. Wealth is no more sacred than human life, and if we can send American boys to the battle line we can send American dollars after them. We can not leave our soldiers unsupported in the field out of a tender regard for the rights of capital or the selfishness of greed.

A word must be said in regard to the success of the National Army. The first week of September witnessed the calling to the colors of that Army of universal service. For their reception it was necessary to build 16 cantonments—practically 16 cities of a population each of 50,000 soldiers. Exemption boards of local citizens existed in every community and district appeal boards in every district, who passed upon the question of which men could be spared to go to the front and which were needed to remain at home. Through the activities of the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, and other organizations the moral conditions of the camps and the communities near them were made fit for the reception of the soldiers, and all wholesome outlet secured for their social instincts.

As witnessing the success of this democratic method of raising a force for national defense it may be pointed out that the cost of enrolling volunteers during the first two years of the Civil War was $34 per capita. The cost of the combined volunteer and draft system during the last two years of war was $24.15 per man. The cost of voluntary enlistment for our Army and Navy during the few months preceding the passage of the draft law, in which the advantage of large numbers of young men voluntarily joining from a spirit of patriotism was felt, was $18.24 per man, but the cost of enrolling the new National Army under the selective conscription law will not exceed $7.30 per man and may possibly fall as low as $5. Never in our history has an army been gathered at such a moderate cost.

Through all of this mighty period of preparation, when the Nation was coming together and fusing itself into a solid mass, when the whole atmosphere was tingling with patriotism and with the desire to shake off the provincialism and lethargy which had kept us dormant so long, not only was the spirit of the business men and commercial classes admirable in every way, but the attitude of organized labor was so splendid as to be beyond all praise. The whole power of the influence and character of the leaders of labor in this country has been thrown on the side of industrial peace and united against strikes and other disturbances which might interfere with the full preparation of the Nation for its great task. They have not only foregone the advantage which the extraordinary demand for labor might give them to enforce new demands, but they have held in abeyance all matters of dispute and disagreement in a spirit of willing sacrifice for the good of the Nation. This spirit should be and will be recognized and rewarded by the American people by a large measure of social justice to all those who depend upon their daily wage for their living.

Every man in time of national peril must sink his private interests, his private wishes, and even his private rights for the supreme advantage of the country's welfare, but he retains in full measure his right to the reward which follows national success and national prosperity.

The period of preparation is rapidly drawing to a close. Some are impatient that so long a time has been needed to prepare, but they must have been of those who had too small comprehension of the magnitude of the problems. Some have thought that there were too many boards and committees and subcommittees, too much division of authority and separation of activities. To these it may be pointed out that it was necessary to enlist all lines of industry through their best representatives to finally consolidate and correlate them into one effective organization. The time is rapidly passing when these subcommittees will be needed, but they have cleared the road and cut out the jungle of antiquated methods and red tape. Their work has been invaluable.

Now there has been created, however, the War Industries Board, which will be directly under the control of the Council of National Defense and of the President, and which will gather the mass of reports of all of the advisory and subcommittees of the council. The order creating this board says, "the board will act as a clearing house for the war industry needs of the Government, determine the most effective ways of meeting them and the best means and methods of increasing production, including the creation or extension of industries demanded by the emergency, the sequence and relative urgency of the needs of the different Government services, and consider price factors, and, in the first instance, the industrial and labor aspects of problems involved and the general questions affecting the purchase of commodities."

Thus the far-reaching powers of this board, small and compact in its membership and highly skilled in its personnel, will enable it to reach out and control all factors—prices, supplies, methods of production, labor, and transportation—which affect the support of a modern army in the field. We are drawing to a head now, and under this board, if its powers be wisely and boldly exercised, our Army in France can feel behind it the strong arm and firm support of the mighty American Nation.

There is no weakness here, no vacillation, no division of powers, no question of authority. But this applies, as will be seen, only to the question of support and supply. It is the pinnacle of the period of preparation, but it does not touch yet the real question of every war—the conduct of the campaign in the field. We are just on the eve of that question. By the 30th of January it is probable that we shall have 2,000,000 or more men ready for the fighting line in Europe, and by that time or before they will have struck telling blows in the great world struggle for democracy. How, then, shall the war be conducted from the standpoint of a campaign? What shall be its policy? Primarily this heavy responsibility rests upon the shoulders of the President of the United States. He may commit it, and probably will commit it, to some properly equipped military or naval staff, retaining to himself, as he must retain, the larger questions of national policy and diplomacy. Success lies, as we know, not in the vacillating hesitancy of many minds, nor even in the wisdom of much counsel, but in the firm decision and quick action of a single purpose. Our purpose now is to strike ringing blows for democracy that a speedy peace may be enforced and feudalism with all of its train of debasing horrors may disappear from the earth.

We can not do this by temporizing nor by stopping every day to restate our plans and purposes and reexamine the path over which we have passed. We can look back with pride in our country and admiration for our vigorous administration over the record of the last year from the creation of the Council of National Defense in August, 1916, to the opening of the cantonments of the National Army in September, 1917. We see an almost magic transformation; not only of the military policy but of the industrial, social, and economic conditions of our country. The giant now is fully awake, fully aroused, and is a match for any foe in the field. By the work of the administration and by the work of its aids drawn from men of all political parties and all walks of life; by the untiring efforts of the National Congress; and by the patriotism of the American people, the full united force of democracy is now available to fight the battle of freedom and to crush feudalism wherever found. The American people are devoted to peace, but the present temper of the American Nation to-day is the response to President Wilson's ringing declaration that "the right is more precious than peace." [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I will take advantage of the fact that I am controlling the time on this side and will take the floor for about 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we are considering the greatest appropriation bill in all the world's history, an appropriation bill the magnitude of which we can not, any of us, possibly comprehend. If we were to count dollars at the rate of five a second—and that is about as fast as anyone can count—and should keep it up for 10 hours a day, it would take a little less than 100 years to count the number of dollars of the people's money we are proposing to appropriate and to authorize the expenditure of in this bill. It is a sum equal to one-sixth of the value of all the farms and ranches of the country and of all the live stock and all the agricultural machinery and all buildings on them. And yet, great as it is, stupendous as the sums are, we are so thoroughly impressed with the necessity of making these appropriations that there will be no opposition to the passage of the bill.

I listened with a very great deal of interest to the exceedingly interesting speech of the very able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the very interesting speech of the equally able ranking minority member of the committee relative to the care with which the committee had considered these appropriations. Six weeks! We used to spend three months going over the sundry civil bill, carrying $140,000,000, and when we got through most of us would admit to ourselves, on personal cross-examination if we would not to others, that we did not know any too much about some of the items of the bill, even at that. And while six weeks is a long time, and the subcommittee gave earnest consideration to the items, none of them, I think, will say that it is possible for anyone to fully determine the necessity for the enormous sums asked and provided for in this bill.

While the House and the House committee are exercising their functions of endeavoring to carefully consider appropriation bills and to control in the matter of policy, yet, as a matter of fact, we are leaving these matters largely with the Executive, and properly so. For who is there in the House who cares to take the responsibility of withholding a dollar in money or a particle of authority which the administration, its advisers, and particularly its naval and military officers, say they believe to be essential for the successful conduct of the war?

We are trying to do our duty by considering, so far as we can in the limited time we have, the general purposes for which these enormous sums are to be used. But so far as being able to greatly control their totals, we can not in the nature of things well do it. Of course, it follows inevitably that in the expenditure of these enormous sums of money in a brief period of time there will be wastefulness and extravagance, and it has been suggested that Congress should appoint a committee whose business it would be to consult with the Executive with regard to these expenditures, with a view of minimizing, so far as may be possible, unwise and extravagant expenditures.

I am rather inclined to agree with the view that the President took of those matters. I am rather inclined to agree with the view taken by the chairman of the committee with regard to that proposed auditing committee. I think we have done our full duty when we have carefully examined the proposed purposes of the estimates and have reduced them, so far as we believe that they can be safely reduced or restricted or directed, as we believe it wise to restrict or direct them. Having done that, we have performed our whole duty; and, further, if we went beyond that and attempted to exercise a control over those expenditures within those limitations and for the purposes provided, we should become responsible through our committee for those expenditures when made.

We should not be so responsible. We should be entirely free from responsibility—free to criticize, properly and reasonably, and in good faith, the expenditures as they may be made. The duties of the legislative body and of the Executive are entirely separate in these matters, and should be kept entirely separate at all times and under all circumstances.

Now, on the other hand, it occurs to me that it would have been well—and I make this suggestion because it so happens that I was not here at the time the matter was under discussion—I think it might have been well for the Congress, in providing for loans to the allies, to have made some provision for a small congressional committee to consult with the Executive in the matter of those loans, because that is a matter not purely of expenditure, but of policy, and the Congress may very properly carry its fixing and determination of policy beyond the general provisions for loans provided in the bill to the point where the sums are actually to be expended in loans to our allies. I am inclined to think that it would have been well, not only from the standpoint of the Congress, but from the standpoint of the administration as well, if a small committee of the House and Senate had been appointed or provided for, to be consulted in connection with those great loans.

Now, there are bound to be, as I said a moment ago, extravagant expenditures, or at least expenditures that appear to be extravagant; expenditures that at least would be extravagant under any other circumstances and conditions. We all know that you can not rapidly expand business of any kind without doing it at an increased cost, and you can not organize and equip great armies and maintain a great military establishment in a world torn with war and filled with increasing demands for all classes of products on the basis of expenditures that would obtain in normal times of peace.

I myself have heard extraordinary stories in the lobbies of the House and hereabouts as to expenditures of money in connection with cantonments. I think any story of that kind reaching a Member of Congress should not be retailed about the House—certainly not given to the country—but should be carried to the men who are responsible for those expenditures, in order that they may know what is going on and prevent it, so far as they are able to do so. As to the truth of those stories, as to the necessity of making the expenditures, I do not pretend to know. I only know that those who are responsible for them should be informed if we have any knowledge.

It is true, in my opinion—and I refer to it again because I referred to it very early in the session—that it is nearly always a very great mistake to let contracts on the basis of a payment to the contractor of a percentage of the total cost. There never was a man so honest and there never was a man so careful of expenditures that he could be safely trusted with a large contract under those terms. Every increase in the cost means added compensation to the man controlling it. As wages go up, the percentage to the contractor increases; as prices advance, his profits grow; if pay rolls are padded by dishonest clerks, his profits are enlarged. When this is the condition under which contracts are let, it is not to be hoped or expected, and it never would be by men who have had business experience, that you would get cheap and satisfactory construction.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Has the gentleman information as to whether these large contracts that were let in this country by foreign nations were made on a percentage basis or not?

Mr. MONDELL. I know very little about that, but my impression is that they were not, so far as I know of them. I have not much knowledge of them; I am not familiar with the procedure, but I am under the impression foreign nations did not make such contracts.

It is a sort of contract that appeals to the man who has never had much experience in the contract business, but it is not the kind of contract that appeals to any man who is a good judge of human nature and knows how those things work out when a great work is to be carried on and large contracts are to be let.

Mr. SLOAN. What does the gentleman think about the necessity of submitting to these contracts? That is, does the gentleman believe that it was necessary as a national policy to place the Government, in the expenditure of its billions, at the mercy of the cupidity of every contractor who was furnishing material or doing work for the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. No, I do not, I say to my friend. I suggested very early in the session that it would be a mistake to make that sort of contracts, and if the stories we have heard are true, my fears were well founded. But those, after all, are incidents of the situation, of vast expansion and development, of rapid growth, and of tremendous expenditure. Our duty is to provide every man, every dollar, every particle of authority that those charged with duty and responsibility believe to be necessary for the successful prosecution of this great struggle in which we are engaged and can give a fairly plausible basis for their belief. When we have done that we have performed our duty, and until we have done that we have not performed our full duty.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Has not every Congress of the United States, in every other war that we have had, exercised its judgment as to how much should be given, rather than allow it to be measured by the request of the administration?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is true that during the Civil War the administration was tremendously hampered by smelling committees, managing committees, meddling committees, and by men who, for one reason or another, were not willing to take the word of those who were responsible as to the men and means necessary for the carrying on of the great struggle. Nowhere in history, however, or in the minds of men can you find a fragrant recollection or a kindly reference to those who thus stood in the way of their Government in its efforts to carry on the war. I feel confident that in the future, as in the past, there will not come from the Republican side of the center aisle, and I hope not from either side, any voice raised with intent of preventing the doing of anything that may be necessary to the successful carrying on of the great enterprise in which we are engaged. I think it is true that we have somewhat failed in our duty to scrutinize as carefully as we should some of the appropriations, not lest we should be misjudged, but lest we should be mistaken as to the necessity for the appropriation or the authority asked for. In order that we might not fall into harmful errors of judgment, we have erred, perhaps, but if so we have erred on the safe side—on the side of our country.

Whatever may have been men's views in the beginning, whether or not they held that our entrance into this great world struggle was necessary, wise, or inevitable, whatever their views were as to the manner in which we should raise the forces with which the war was to be carried on, however that may have been, the people of the country, with comparatively few exceptions, are now united in their determination that nothing shall be left undone to make effective our part in this great war which we at least hope, and most of us believe has become in these days, whatever it may have been in the beginning, a war, as the President has said, to make the world safe for democracy.

Mr. Chairman, how long have I spoken?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has spoken 23 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Following out my question, I want to call attention to the last foreign war we were engaged in, when Congress limited the amount of appropriations, even in the declaration itself, to $10,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I know that in the beginning of the Spanish War, even when our boys were exposed to hostile gunfire, the Democratic side of the House was inclined to withhold revenue. But that was not a very big war. I have been inclined to forgive them for their attitude, and the country after a while forgot it. If it had been a great war, and much had depended on it, the country would not have forgotten. When it came to the bill that was to raise the funds for carrying on that war, when the enemy's guns were thundering on land and sea, that side voted to withhold support. If it had developed into a great war, the country would not have forgotten it for many a long year.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not want to be misunderstood. I had reference to the Mexican War.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the Mexican war! I had forgotten that we had a war in Mexico. I thought we had only several years of disturbed peace with Mexico.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He means the old Mexican War of 1847, not the late Mexican war.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, as I happen to be one of my distinguished colleague's hearers, present in Congress not because I expect to make a speech but that I may be enlightened and broadened by his wisdom and erudition, I hope he will pardon an interruption.

Mr. MONDELL. Under those circumstances I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REED. The gentleman has given us a graphic and startling picture of the burdens this war is placing upon the American people, of the stupendous sums of money that will be needed, and the unprecedented taxes that must be levied. Following this he has ventured a beautiful, hopeful, and I trust truthful prophecy of the future of civilization when the war has been prosecuted to a successful conclusion and "the world made safe for democracy."

What I desire to ask is my colleague's opinion of the proper proportion of these vast war costs he thinks might justly be passed on to the generations of our country who will live in a world made safe for democracy and enjoy its peace and prosperity.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that is rather foreign to the matter under discussion. We are now making appropriations. The gentleman is discussing the raising of revenue. But I will say that I agree with what the House did in that matter in the main. I agree in the main with what the Senate did in the matter. I think we have gone quite as far as we should in laying burdens on the American people in the bill which is now in conference. I believe that future generations will benefit by these expenditures. Whether they do or not, if we are to con-time this war for any length of time, we should not now bankrupt and impoverish the people from whom we must next year and the year after possibly secure the funds to carry on the war. It is all very easy for those of us who do not have to pay much in the way of income taxes to talk about taking all of the income of a man who has a large amount. But I have never been able to take the view that it is proper to confiscate, even though the man whose property you propose to confiscate may have a considerable amount of it. And viewing it from the practical standpoint of revenue for years to come and of a market for bonds we must sell, I think that if some gentlemen had their way we would get all some folks have this year, not have much of anything next year, and in the meantime have some difficulty in selling bonds. If the war continues, we may have to increase the burden; it is well to leave some margin to go on.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the very few moments remaining to me I want to talk about a matter in no wise connected with the bill, a matter somewhat local, although it affects an enormous area of country.

On the 29th day of last December we passed what is known as the stock-raising homestead bill. I see the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, who is largely responsible for that legislation, has honored me with his presence here, perhaps because he expects to speak a little later. [Laughter.]

Almost immediately after the passage of this bill we provided an appropriation of $150,000 for the classification of lands that were applied for under the bill. Unfortunately the bill which carried that appropriation failed in the Senate. It therefore became necessary at the beginning of this special session to reenact the sundry civil bill and the appropriations that it carried, and by reason of that delay the appropriation did not become available until the latter part of June. In the meantime, however, those responsible for the classifications that were to be made knew that the appropriations were coming, and it seems to me ought to have made preparation for the work.

Now we have reached nearly the middle of September, nine months after the passage of the bill. The frost is on the pumpkin and in many places the fodder is in the shock. In another six weeks it will be too late to look over the land in the northern States and determine their character as to whether or not they should be designated as enterable under the stock-raising homestead law.

A situation exists there with which I have become very familiar by reason of a visit home recently when the House was marking time—a situation that is exceedingly trying and unsatisfactory to everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman in charge of the time, in this case, will grant an extension to the speaker of at least five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Nebraska, and with the consent of the Chair, I will yield myself five additional minutes.

The law in question provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall designate the lands that may be entered under the law in question; but in the meantime the entryman may make his application. Many thousands have made such applications, covering in the aggregate many millions of acres, but the law gives the entryman no right to possess himself of the land, and thus an intolerable condition exists, a condition satisfactory to no one. The homesteader seeking a location, particularly he who has made an original location, is not able to get a foothold on the land and hangs between heaven and earth, between Wyoming and Missouri, between Oklahoma and Montana, uncertain where his home and habitation is, undecided as to his future. The stockman who has utilized the land does not know how much of it will be designated, or when, and therefore what he can depend on—an altogether unsatisfactory situation and condition for everybody.

As time passes the situation grows worse and worse and is reaching a point where Congress will be compelled to take some drastic action relative to these designations unless they are hurried up, and hurried up more rapidly than under present plans and conditions, it seems to me, they can be. I am not disposed to criticize the men who have charge of doing this work, because I realize the difficulties under which they have been laboring, but the matter can not be allowed to drag through another year.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I approve of everything the gentleman is saying, and I am glad he has taken and is taking such an interest in the matter. There are 70,000 applications by men trying to get some of these lands. They are and have been moving slowly, and if they are not careful another year will have elapsed with these applications not acted upon and nothing done.

Mr. MONDELL. Seventy thousand applications. That means 70,000 families, and five people in a family; 350,000 people affected directly in the matter of establishing a home and about 24,000,000 acres involved. I think that is an area two-thirds of the size of the great State of Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman give us the cause of the delay, in the estimation of the gentleman?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the department should have got to work earlier when it knew that funds would be available. They left the matter of securing men for the work, except as they could spare them from other work, to the Civil Service Commission, and the commission finds it difficult to find men that they are willing to certify for the work. The department tells me they have taken about every man certified to them for this work, and still they have comparatively few men in the field and the work is going very slowly.

So far they have something less than 50 men on the work in the field—one or two parties in each of the States of Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, and parties about to start in South Dakota, Colorado, and elsewhere. Under the policy pursued each party is expected to examine only a few sections a day, and even though the parties are largely increased a comparatively small area can be examined before the weather in the Northern States puts an end to the work for the season. I have no doubt those intrusted with this work have made an effort to get it going, and I realize the conditions have been unfavorable. I did not favor the provisions of the stock-raising homestead law, which made these detailed examinations necessary. I did my best to have the matter simplified, and I believe it will yet be necessary to do that. My own thought is that under these circumstances and conditions the department is not justified, and it is not necessary as a matter of fact, to have so careful and detailed an examination as they are proposing to make. I think I could easily classify a township a day. Practically all of this territory left unentered out there now is of the kind of land described in the bill. I can not believe that any special harm would be done. I believe the benefits would far outweigh any disadvantages if we said to-day that the unentered public lands of these States which do not contain timber and are not irrigable should be open to entry under this law. The lands now designated under the enlarged-homestead law could, at least, all be considered as enterable under the grazing-homestead law, and that would settle thousands of cases at once.

I now yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say at the outset to the gentleman from Wyoming that it was not because I desired to make a speech that I remained here, but on account of the intense interest I took in his very able remarks.

This bill appropriates something over $40,000,000 for ammunition for small arms, and it authorizes the entering into contracts for $700,000,000 worth of ammunition for small and large arms. It is of a matter directly connected with the ammunition question that I desire to speak for a few moments. My object in addressing the House is to call the attention of my colleagues and of the country to the very important action taken a few days ago by the War Department in regard to the production of nitrogen. This action has received, so far as I know, practically no comment in the newspapers. So far as I know, it has not been referred to on the floor of the House or the Senate. It deals, of course, with a matter very largely technical, of which people generally have little knowledge, and it is not surprising that it has been crowded out of journalistic comment by more sensational war news. Yet the action taken is of vast if not vital importance to the safety of the Nation and to our continuance as a potent factor in this war. I have two objects in calling this matter to the attention of the House. One is, I confess, of a rather personal nature, because it is based upon the satisfaction that few of us are big enough not to feel in being able to say, "I told you so," for the statement of the War Department as to its action, taken and contemplated in respect to the production of nitrogen, confirms in every detail what I have repeatedly said and other gentlemen have repeatedly said in opposition to the proposition for the expenditure of $20,000,000 and more for the creation of a water-power site and the erection of a Government nitrate plant.

My other object, far more important, is to show that a situation has been brought about by the intelligent action of this Government, with the assistance of a number of prominent

American engineers and scientists and chemists, by which the country is assured during this war, no matter what may happen, regardless of whether or not we may by some chance be cut off from the Chile nitrate supply, of an absolutely sufficient and cheap supply of nitric acid, without which it is impossible to make ammunition or explosives of any kind, without which we would be impotent in the conduct of a war, either defensive or offensive, and without which the enormous amount of money appropriated in this bill would be absolutely useless. This happy situation is better summed up than I could sum it up in a letter written by Dr. Herty, formerly the president of the American Chemical Society, now the editor of the official organ of the American Chemical Society, known as the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, and a member of the committee appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate this question. In a letter written to the editor of the Manufacturers' Record and published a few days ago he says:

I am sure you will rejoice with me that through the genius of American chemists the problem of nitrate supply has been solved in what I believe to be the most advanced and best way known to the world at the present day. Knowing your intense patriotism, I am confident that you will also rejoice in the fact that through this method this country will receive supplies of fixed nitrogen far more quickly than possible under the methods which would require time in the development of water power.

Note that, gentlemen—

Both agriculture and munitions need this supply as quickly as possible, and I believe that we have found the best, quickest, and cheapest way the world has known to date.

Commenting upon this question, this Journal of the Chemical Society says in its last number, published upon the 6th of this month:

The great advantage of the processes adopted lies in the fact that a large plant can be built near the fertilizer and consumption center, thus minimizing transportation charges in the distribution of the output. At the same time numerous small plants can be erected, if desired, in any part of the country in connection with plants now manufacturing or contemplating the manufacture of explosives.

Gentlemen who have heard me speak of this matter on previous occasions will remember that one of the reasons why I was so opposed to this $20,000,000 nitrate scheme was that it contemplated only one plant in this country, a plant dependent for its success upon a dam, and we were asked—for it was equivalent to asking us to do so—to bet our national existence upon the continued existence of one dam. Since then the War Department has discovered that under the method proposed, the method which in substance I have been advocating for the past two years, we can have small munition plants, small nitrate plants, all over the country, so that there can be no possible danger, no matter what happens in this war, of our being shut off from an absolutely sufficient supply of explosives. If these statements are true—and their truth can not be doubted—it becomes apparent that we have succeeded in solving one of the most vexing and important problems that has faced the Nation. It offers absolute proof that American genius, spurred on by patriotism, has risen to the occasion, as it always rises to the occasion [applause], and this is an occasion, gentlemen, in which the Nation, I think, may well rejoice. The report upon which these comments were based was issued under the authority of the War Department on the 21st of last month.

As I say, few people have heard of it, because it has received practically no comment in the newspapers. That report gives in detail the action already taken and the action contemplated by the Government upon this question. I would like to take the time to read the report to the Members of the House, for it is intensely interesting, but it would be an undue waste of time and I shall now ask unanimous consent to publish it as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, if it will not interfere with the gentleman, will he briefly state to the committee what the plan of the Government contemplates?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will be glad later on to do so in a very brief way, but the gentleman can much better understand it by reading this report, which only covers about two pages, and it takes up in sequence the various methods upon which the department has decided.

Mr. CRISP. I am frank to say that I have seen nothing of that report, and I shall be very glad, indeed, to read it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman will be much interested and much enlightened and that it will interest every Member of the House. Now, the action taken by the War Department was under authority of section 124 of the national-defense act, which, after providing for the expenditure of $20,000,000, as gentlemen will remember, for the erection of a water-power nitrate plant, provision for which we authorized in the last bond bill and in preceding bond bills, fortunately had this saving clause in that it authorized the President to make an investigation before spending this money in the way suggested as to the best, cheapest, and most available method for the production of nitrogen.

With this purpose in view, the president of the National Academy of Sciences, at the request of the Secretary of War, named a committee of prominent engineers and scientists to examine into this question, and agents were also appointed to go abroad to investigate the question in other countries. Among them was Dr. Charles L. Parsons, one of the great chemists of the country and the chief chemist of the Bureau of Mines, and he last fall visited a number of the European countries and made an extended report to the Secretary of War upon his return. Subsequent to this the Secretary of War appointed a committee on nitrate supply, headed by Gen. Crozier and a number of other gentlemen whose names appear in the report—I will not pause to enumerate them now—which committee, after considering the report of Dr. Parsons and others, rendered the opinion and made the recommendation upon which the department has taken action. The outstanding feature of the action officially taken is the postponement indefinitely of the proposition to make nitrogen in any form by the use of water power. This, thank goodness, gentlemen, sounds the death knell of that Muscle Shoals $20,000,000 nitrate scheme. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GARNER. It also is a fair illustration of trusting the President in the handling of these problems, is it not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have nothing but commendation for the President in this case. I have not commendation for some gentlemen on this floor, though, who supported that proposition.

Mr. GARNER. I hope the gentleman does not refer to me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I, of course, do not allude to the gentleman from Texas. The project involved the most uncalled for and indefensible waste of the public money that I have ever known since I became a Member of Congress. Most of you will recall that its abettors and supporters have been knocking at the doors of Congress for some years. First they tried to get in at the front door of Congress on the proposition for a $60,000,000 expenditure to promote navigation and furnish water power. They at least were frank at that time. Being unsuccessful, they attempted to enter the side door, let us say, with the proposition of building a Government plant for the manufacture of fertilizer, and, being defeated in that effort, they finally succeeded in getting through the back door of Congress, under the plea of preparedness, with a proposition which, they said, was for the purpose of supplying this Government with nitrates in time of war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the gentleman, he considers that the death knell of this scheme has now been sounded.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish I could have as much optimism as my friend from Ohio, but this scheme has been buried so often and resurrected so often that I have not the confidence of the gentleman. I wish to say, however, that I think the gentleman from Ohio should be commended as much as the President, because I have no doubt that it was his determined opposition to this scheme that led to the investigation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I thank the gentleman for his very courteous remark, whether deserved or not; and I will say further to him that I do not believe there is a man in Congress, from wherever he may come, even if he lives on the banks of the Tennessee River, who would dare, in the face of this report, to advocate that scheme again on the floor of this House. Fortunately—

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. Would that rule apply to any character of water power for the purpose of producing nitrates under this report?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think so.

Mr. GARNER. And that same statement will apply to any other water-power proposition—

Mr. LONGWORTH. For the purpose of producing nitrogen cheaply and in ample quantity for the needs of the country, yes. I do not, of course, say that it is not possible to thus make nitrogen, because it can be made that way, but it is an expensive matter—it is very expensive—and there is probably no water-power site in this country, no matter how much money we might spend on it, which could produce nitrogen in sufficient quantity and cheapness for our uses.

Now, fortunately, as I have said, the President, and again I commend him for it, took advantage of the saving clause of this act providing for an investigation, and the result has been the saving to the people of millions upon millions of dollars which would have been wasted in the erection of a plant which, as I have repeatedly said before, would have been obsolete before it had been finished. The fact is this $20,000,000 was only an entering wedge. Do not overlook that fact. Speaking of the cost of such a plant, Dr. Parsons, after an examination of the Norway sites, the best in the world, and other water-power sites, wrote in his report, in opposition to the use of water power for this purpose, as follows:

An arc plant—

Such as the Muscle Shoals project proposed—of sufficient size to meet the requirements of the war would probably have to remain idle for the most part during times of peace owing to the difficulty of disposing of the nitric acid that the plant would produce if in operation. On account of the large amount of horsepower required and the consequent extent of the necessary plant and tower-absorption capacity, the cost of installing an arc plant to meet the war-time requirements of the Government would be several times the total appropriation made for the purpose by Congress.

Several times $20,000,000, gentlemen, forty, or sixty, or eighty, or one hundred millions run into money even in these times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman give me about 10 minutes?

Mr. MONDELL. There are quite a number of other gentlemen who want to speak, and I am only handling the time for the gentleman from Massachusetts. Could the gentleman conclude in five minutes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will try to do so.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will not be able in that time, I fear, to answer the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] or that of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Such an amount runs into money even if wisely expended, but we would have a hard time, my friends, in defending our action if we had spent twenty, or forty, or fifty million dollars for this purpose, and it would have turned out, as it surely would have, an absolute waste of the public money.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman in that conclusion. But what I would like to know is this, namely, from the gentleman's investigation is there anything that leads him to the conclusion that the Government ought to produce nitrate under any condition?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Undoubtedly the Government will produce its nitrates by the use of another process, and if I had time I would like to discuss that a little bit.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is this $20,000,000 available for this new purpose?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; and the President and the War Department have decided to use it for other purposes, but no part of it for a water-power nitrate plant.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the process now proposed a process of extraction from the air?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. I think I can develop that in a few moments.

The question of the production of nitric acid is a comparatively new one, as we all know—new, at least, in the sense that it has only recently, just before the beginning of the war, in fact, been made the subject of national thought and action by any country. Every country until recently has relied entirely, to all intents and purposes, for its supply of nitrogen upon the nitrate of soda, which was produced only in Chile. Germany was the first country that fully realized that if a situation should be brought about by which they were cut off from this supply they would soon be absolutely helpless from a military point of view unless they could arrange for the production of nitrogen either at or near home; and so they immediately set out, with that forethought that Germany has shown throughout, devising means for the production of nitrogen at or near home.

There are two ways of extracting nitrogen, so far as known, I believe. One is directly from the air by the arc process, by the use of electricity, which makes necessary a tremendous energy produced cheaply. And Germany for a time produced their nitrogen by acquiring control, through the German syndicate, of the Norway water-power site, where water power is produced at less than $5 per horsepower per year. There is not another water-power site in the world, there is not one in this country, that can furnish water power at anything like so cheap a price. Nitric acid was made there by Germany and imported into Germany for the purpose of making munitions. But in the meantime their chemists were also experimenting upon other methods, and soon they discovered what is known as the Haber process, which makes nitric acid cheaply by the oxidation of ammonia. Accordingly the German syndicate sold its interest in the arc process in Norway, because they believed they had discovered, as it is shown they have, at home a better, cheaper, and more efficient means of making nitrogen.

So the consequence has been, gentlemen, that Germany, although cut off entirely from the supply from Chile, has been able since the war began to increase its nitrogen production from a little more than 100,000 tons to over 350,000 tons.

That is enough not only to supply her needs for explosives but also to furnish enough nitrogen for her agricultural needs. Thus, without the use of an ounce of water power, since the beginning of the war Germany, cut off practically from all outside sources of supply, has been able to feed her own people and to produce in practically unlimited quantities her own explosives. It is a lesson in long-headed preparedness by which other nations may well profit.

The method which the War Department proposes for the production of nitrogen is a development and improvement of the Haber process, fully described in the report of the War Department, which I hope that you all may read.

It proves that this great problem has now been solved and that whether or not the time may come when we shall be cut off from the Chile nitrate supply, we will find ourselves in a position as good or better than Germany, able, without any outside help, to produce all the explosives necessary for our guns and have a large and cheap supply left over for stimulating the fertility of our soil. It is a situation over which we may well rejoice, gentlemen of the House, and I think that you will pardon me for the time that I have occupied in bringing it to your attention.

Under the leave to print, I insert the same herewith:

A STATEMENT OF THE ACTION TAKEN AND CONTEMPLATED LOOKING TO THE FIXATION OF NITROGEN PURSUANT TO SECTION 124, "NITRATE SUPPLY," OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS APPROVED JUNE 3, 1916, GENERALLY KNOWN AS THE NATIONAL-DEFENSE ACT.

DIVISION T, ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
August 21, 1917.

The national defense act, in its section 124, provided for a supply of nitrogenous materials by authorizing and empowering the President to make or cause to be made such investigation as, in his judgment, might be necessary to determine the best, cheapest, and most available means for the production of nitrates and other products for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products—this by water power or any other power as might be best not cheapest—to designate for the exclusive use of the United States such water-power sites as in his opinion might be necessary to construct and operate dams, etc., or other means than water power as in his judgment might be best and cheapest for the generation of power and for the production of nitrates as above; also to procure by condemnation or otherwise any lands, rights of way, materials, minerals, and processes, patented or otherwise. It was provided by this act that "the products of such plants shall be used by the President for military and naval purposes to the extent that he may deem necessary, and any surplus which he shall determine is not required shall be sold and disposed of by him under such regulations as he may prescribe."

The primary step required under these provisions of law was, therefore, an investigation to determine the best, cheapest, and most available means for the production of the desired nitrogenous materials, or "nitrates."

With this purpose in view, the president of the National Academy of Sciences, in cooperation with the American Chemical Society, and at the request of the Secretary of War, appointed a committee consisting of the following scientists and engineers:

Arthur A. Noyes (chairman), Leo H. Bakeland, Gano Dunn, Charles H. Herty, Warrane K. Lewis, Michael L. Pupin, Theodore W. Richards, Ellihu Thompson, Willis R. Whitney.

In addition to this committee's investigations special agents were appointed to acquire all possible further information. These agents had access to some quite unusual sources of information, and collected data, including detailed records of the costs of various processes employed at home and abroad, which have been most instructive, but which—on account of the sources from which they were obtained and the conditions under which they were given—can not be made public.

One of these agents was Mr. Eysten Berg, who visited Europe and submitted a report. Another of these agents was Dr. Charles L. Parsons, chief chemist of the Bureau of Mines, Interior Department, who, in the course of his investigations, visited the noted plants of Italy, France, England, Norway, and Sweden during the fall of 1916, and was able to give in his reports a most valuable summary and comparison of recent progress and conditions in the nitrogen-fixation industry at home and abroad, elaborated by extensive statistics of a confidential nature.

In his reports Dr. Parsons laid special emphasis upon the rapid development in the United States of processes for the direct synthesis of ammonia from nitrogen and hydrogen, for its synthesis through the formation of cyanides as an intermediate product, and for the oxidation of ammonia to nitric acid. He called attention to the process, developed by the General Chemical Co., for the synthesis of ammonia by the direct combination of nitrogen and hydrogen at lower pressures than those previously deemed necessary and contemplated by the Haber patents, and to the facts that this process had been in successful use on a large experimental scale, and that, indeed, one unit thus in use was larger than those supposed to be in use in Germany. He showed that this American company had also developed and brought to a commercial basis a method of producing the mixture of nitrogen and hydrogen required for the synthesis of ammonia at a cost lower than any theretofore attained in this country or probably even in Germany, and that this company had progressed so far that it had already made plans for a commercial plant using this process. Dr. Parsons also obtained from the General Chemical Co. a tentative proposal of an agreement whereby that company would grant to the Government of the United States the use of its processes and designs for apparatus for the synthesis of ammonia and for the oxidation of ammonia to nitric acid, upon the following very liberal terms: Without compensation of any kind for products to be used exclusively for munitions of war, and with a royalty upon products to be used for fertilizers.

Dr. Parsons's reports also contained a summary of recent developments in the cyanide process and a confidential statement from the Nitrogen Products Co. of their estimated costs by that process, together with an offer of unrestricted use of their patents upon such processes, without any compensation for use in the manufacture of munitions of war, and subject to a royalty of $5 per ton of fixed nitrogen for use of their processes for the production of fertilizer.

He was also able to report that under a cooperative arrangement between the Bureau of Mines and the Semet-Solvay Co. a small plant for the oxidation of ammonia to nitric acid had been constructed and was progressing successfully; also that an experimental plant for the same purpose was being operated by the General Chemical Co. and had developed some new features, thus showing that satisfactory progress was being made in this country toward the solution of the difficulties involved in the construction and operation of such a plant upon a large scale.

Finally, Dr. Parsons stated his belief that the processes using large quantities of power would be in this country displaced by these newer processes which require comparatively little power, and he recommended that the Government build a moderate-sized plant for production of ammonia by synthesis and undertake active experimentation with the cyanide process.

With the object of securing an opinion, based upon a comprehensive view of all the facts collected by the several agencies, the Secretary of War appointed the following "committee on nitrate supply":

Brig. Gen. William Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, War Department; Rear Admiral Ralph Earle, Chief of Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department; Brig. Gen. William M. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, War Department; Mr. F. W. Brown, Bureau of Soils, Department of Agriculture; Dr. Leo H. Baekeland, Yonkers, N. Y.; Mr. Gano Dunn, 43 Exchange Place, New York; Dr. Charles H. Herty, 35 East Forty-first Street, New York; Dr. William F. Hillebrand, Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce; Dr. Arthur A. Noyes, Institute of Technology, Boston, Mass.; Dr. Charles L. Parsons, Bureau of Mines, Interior Department; Dr. Willis R. Whitney, Schenectady, N. Y.

This committee gave careful consideration to all the information available, and duly weighed the several purposes stated by the language of the act, recommending the following action:

I. That the Government negotiate with the General Chemical Co. for the right to use its synthetic ammonia processes.

II. That, contingent upon satisfactory result of such negotiations, there be set aside from the $20,000,000 appropriated such sum, estimated as about $3,000,000, as should be necessary to build a plant to produce by that process about 60,000 pounds of ammonia per 24-hour day; location, southwest Virginia preferably.

III. That out of the same appropriation $600,000, or as much more as needed, be set aside for building a plant for producing by oxidation of ammonia about the equivalent of 24,000 pounds of 100 per cent nitric acid per 24-hour day.

IV. That the War Department proceed at the earliest practical date with the construction of the oxidation plant and contingent upon satisfactory arrangements with the General Chemical Co. with the construction of the synthetic ammonia plant also.

V. That the Government negotiate with the Nitrogen Products Co. with the view to a contract for the right to use that company's patents and proceed with experimentation looking toward the industrial development of the Bucher process for production of ammonia through cyanide; and that contingent upon satisfactory arrangement as above a sum not over $200,000 be allotted out of the nitrate supply appropriation.

VI. That out of the $20,000,000 nitrate supply appropriation $100,000 be allotted for active investigation of processes for the industrial production of nitrogen compounds useful in the manufacture of explosives or fertilizers—this under supervision of the War Department.

VII. That in order to increase the production of ammonia and to help the Government promote the installation of by-product coke ovens by directing priority in production and transportation of materials and parts.

VIII. That the decision as to more extensive installation of nitrogen fixation processes and water-power development in connection with them be postponed until the plants above recommended are in operation or until further need arises.

IX. That while the preceding recommendations include all the measures that can now judiciously be taken for the fixation of ammonia it is the opinion of the committee that the immediate accumulation and the permanent maintenance of an ample reserve not less than 500,000 tons of Chile saltpeter is the measure most urgently necessary.

The foregoing report having met with general approval, the Secretary of War has directed the Chief of Ordnance of the Army to proceed to carry out the first six of the recommendations of the nitrate supply committee and has announced that for the present the consideration of development of large water-power installations which had been begun by the Interdepartmental Board (Secretaries Baker, Lane, and Houston) appointed by the President would be suspended.

The outstanding feature of this program for action is the construction of the synthetic ammonia plant using the General Chemical Co.'s process, which was largely developed by their engineer, Mr. Frederick de Jahn. As has been indicated, this process has already had trial upon a sufficient scale to demonstrate its practicability and to indicate as most probable its ability to produce ammonia at a very favorable price. In fact, in the search of the nitrate supply committee for the best, cheapest, and most available means for the production of nitrates and other products that would be of use in the manufacture of munitions and in the manufacture of fertilizers, this process appeared to give more promise of affording relief from dependence upon foreign nitrates for the defense of the country and more promise of a reduction in the cost of the nitrogenous constituent of fertilizer than others. Furthermore, this process is one which can be put into operation in a much less time than would be required to develop such a large water power as would be needed for other prominent processes available. This process gives as its primary product ammonia, which may be used directly as a constituent of fertilizer or which can be converted into ammonium sulphate or ammonium phosphate in the same manner as ammonia from any other source may be so converted. Processes for such conversion are known and appear to require no special development under this particular act. The cost of ammonia is expected to be quite low by this process, and will not be increased when the ammonia is used for munitions manufacture by any payments whatever for the rights to the processes, a satisfactory agreement to this effect having been made with the General Chemical Co. That same agreement provides that in so far as the General Chemical Co.'s processes shall be used in the manufacture of products for fertilizers a royalty of $5 per ton of 2,000 pounds of fixed nitrogen in any form shall be paid. This extremely liberal arrangement will add but a very small amount to the cost of producing the nitrogenous portion of the fertilizer, amounting to a charge of something less than 25 cents per ton of the usual mixed fertilizer. From the tentative offer of the Nitrogen Products Co. it is expected that there will be formally ratified a like liberal agreement for the use by the Government of that company's processes. There thus appears at this time to be no necessity for the President to exercise the rights granted by the act for the acquisition of necessary processes by condemnation, all that it has been considered necessary to use having been freely granted upon liberal terms.

The Ordnance Department of the Army is proceeding as energetically as possible with the work intrusted to it, has made arrangements for taking over orders at cost which the General Chemical Co. had placed for apparatus for a considerable size plant for their own use, and thus gains considerable headway upon much of the apparatus, as well as favorable prices; the prominent engineering and construction firm, the J. G. White Engineering Corporation, has been engaged for the remaining engineering work and the actual construction; the plans for apparatus are essentially complete, and designs for all of the buildings are very nearly completed as a result of work done by the engineers of the General Chemical Co. There is thus at the present time every reason to expect that, notwithstanding the extreme difficulty and expense involved in any large construction work at this time, the plant will be not unduly delayed.

The construction of the oxidation plant is a less extensive work, and its commencement is being postponed for a short time in order to reap the full advantage of the important experimental work being carried on by the General Chemical Co., the Semet-Solvay Co., and the Bureau of Mines.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE NITRATE SUPPLY COMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 11, 1917.

The nitrate-supply committee, constituted as follows: Brig. Gen. William Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, War Department; Rear Admiral Ralph Earle, Chief of Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department; Brig. Gen. William M. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, War Department; Mr. F. W. Brown, Bureau of Soils, Department of Agriculture; Dr. Leo H. Baekeland, Yonkers, N. Y.; Mr. Gano Dunn, 43 Exchange Place, New York, N. Y.; Dr. Charles H. Herty, 35 East Forty-first Street, New York, N. Y.; Dr. William F. Hillebrand, Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce; Dr. Arthur A. Noyes, Institute of Technology, Boston, Mass.; Dr. Charles L. Parsons, Bureau of Mines, Interior Department; Dr. Willis R. Whitney, Schenectady, N. Y.; and appointed by the Secretary of War to succeed and continue the work of a former committee, which was appointed by the National Academy of Sciences at the request of the War Department, met at 10 o'clock a. m., at the call of Gen. Crozier.

All of the members were present excepting Gen. Black, who was represented on the committee by Col. Charles Keller, of the Corps of Engineers. Col. C. B. Wheeler, Ordnance Department, also sat with the committee and took part in its proceedings, Gen. Crozier presiding at the meeting but not voting. The authority for Gen. Crozier to call the committee together and the object of the meeting is indicated by the following letter of the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 14, 1917.

Brig. Gen. WILLIAM CROZIER,
Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.
Member Nitrate Supply Committee.

SIR: Referring to my letter of March 9 last appointing you a member of the nitrate-supply committee, I desire that you shall act in calling the committee together at appropriate times for necessary action, and that you shall convey to it such communications as I may have to make.

The committee should now be called together as soon as practicable for the purpose of considering the reports and recommendations concerning the process which should be adopted for the manufacture of nitrates, which reference to the possibility of harmonizing the various views and reaching a common conclusion in regard to as many of the recommendations as possible.

Respectfully,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

After a preliminary statement by the chairman the committee proceeded to the matter in hand and considered previous reports and recommendations concerning the process which should be adopted for the manufacture of nitrates, which included the following papers:

I. Report on nitrate supply presented to the Secretary of War by the committee on nitrate supply of the National Academy of Sciences and of the National Research Council, dated January 20, 1917.

II. Preliminary report to the Ordnance Department of the War Department on the nitrogen industry, with recommendations regarding the methods to be used by the United States Government in procuring the necessary nitric acid required for munitions by the War and Navy Departments by Charles L. Parsons, chief chemist, Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, January 27, 1917 (see p. 833, this issue).

III. Report on the nitrogen industry, by Eysten Berg, C. E., dated January 15, 1917.

IV. Report on the nitrogen industry, by Charles L. Parsons, chief chemist, Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, dated April 30, 1917. This latter report included an offer of the General Chemical Co. granting to the Government, under certain conditions, the right to use its synthetic process for the production of ammonia, etc., and also an offer of the Nitrogen Products Co., granting to the Government under certain conditions the right to use the so-called Bucher process for the production of sodium cyanide and ammonia (see p. 833, this issue).

After a deliberate and careful consideration of all the matter and information at the disposal of the committee, it submits the following as its action:

The committee, appreciating the offer of the General Chemical Co., recommends:

1. That the Government enter into negotiations to acquire the rights to use the synthetic ammonia process of that company.
2. That contingent upon satisfactory arrangements with the General Chemical Co., out of the $20,000,000 nitrate-supply appropriation, such sum as may be needed, now estimated at $3,000,000, be placed at the disposal of the War Department to be used in building a synthetic ammonia plant, employing the said process of the General Chemical Co., and of a capacity of 60,000 pounds of ammonia per 24-hour day, said plant to be located in a region where land, water, coal, and sulphuric acid are cheaply available, where good transportation facilities exist, and where the proposed new powder plant of the Government can be properly located. In the opinion of this committee all of these conditions just enumerated are best fulfilled by a location in southwest Virginia or contiguous region.

3. That out of the $20,000,000 nitrate-supply appropriation an amount now estimated at $600,000, or as much as may be needed, be placed at the disposal of the War Department to be used in building a plant for the oxidation of ammonia to nitric acid and the concentration of nitric acid, of a capacity equivalent to 24,000 pounds of 100 per cent nitric acid in a 24-hour day, said plant to be located in the neighborhood of the aforesaid synthetic ammonia plant and the proposed new powder plant of the Government.

4. That the War Department proceed at the earliest practical date with the construction of the oxidation plant and contingent upon a satisfactory arrangement with the General Chemical Co., also with the synthetic ammonia plant, and that the Government give such priority orders as will secure from contractors prompt delivery of the materials and rapid construction of the structure and machinery needed for these plants.

The committee appreciating the offer of the Nitrogen Products Co. granting, in this country, to the Government under certain conditions the right to use the so-called Bucher process for the production of sodium cyanide and ammonia recommends:

5. That a form of contract drawn with the advice of the legal authorities of the Government, such as to give that company no guaranty or exclusive rights in the process, or in its future development, beyond those which the company's own patents give to it, be entered into with the Nitrogen Products Co., and that experimentation looking toward the industrial development of the Bucher process for the production of ammonia be at once proceeded with. And further that, contingent upon a satisfactory arrangement with the Nitrogen Products Co., a sum not to exceed $200,000 be allotted for this purpose out of the $20,000,000 nitrate-supply appropriation.

6. That out of the $20,000,000 nitrate-supply appropriation $100,000 be made available for the active prosecution of investigations of processes for the industrial production of nitrogen compounds useful in the manufacture of explosives of fertilizers, and that these investigations be planned and supervised by the War Department.

7. That, in order to increase the production of ammonia and toluol, the Government promote the installation of by-product coke ovens by directing that priority be given in the production, delivery, and transportation of the materials and parts needed in their construction.

8. That the decision as to more extensive installation of nitrogen-fixation processes and water-power development in connection with them, be postponed until the plants above recommended are in operation or until further need arises.

9. While the preceding recommendations include all the measures that can now judiciously be taken for the fixation of nitrogen and the oxidation of ammonia, it is the opinion of the committee that the immediate accumulation and the permanent maintenance of an ample reserve, not less than 500,000 tons of Chile saltpeter, is the measure most urgently necessary.

There being no further business before it, the committee then, at 6.15 p. m., adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman.

William Crozier (chairman), Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army; Ralph Earle, Rear Admiral, Chief of Ordnance, United States Navy; F. W. Brown; Leo H. Backeland; Gano Dunn; Charles H. Herty; Charles Keller, Colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Wm. F. Hillebrand; Arthur A. Noyes; Charles L. Parsons; Willis R. Whitney.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address a few remarks to a piece of legislation which was completed yesterday afternoon, not that it may have any particular effect on the further progress of that piece of legislation, but it is due to a number of us who desired to express our views on that measure and were not given opportunity even to extend our remarks. I desire to give some of the reasons for our support of the measure, notwithstanding our criticism of objectionable, vicious features.

The legislation I refer to, of course, is the compensation and insurance bill provided for the new army. I desire to say this: The history of that legislation is probably unique in all the history of legislation of the American Congress. I presume it is the first time that ever a self-constituted organization of individuals came together under the direction of the head of a department of this Government and arrogated to itself the function of drafting a completed piece of legislation, and when that was done, instead of presenting it to the legislative body or some member thereof, presented it to the Executive of the Nation, whose constitutional function in legislation is to recommend legislation from this platform or by a written message, or, after it has been passed, to approve or veto it. Then after obtaining Executive approval in advance the bill was handed to a Member of the House for introduction.

Now, I mention these facts not so much in a spirit of criticism but as a matter of importance in legislative history. It was certainly the first time that the judiciary, as in this case, combined with the Executive to prepare and present legislation and to have it grooved through Congress. The judiciary, according to some of our old-fashioned notions, should always, whether it is the Supreme Court or any of the Federal courts or any judge thereof, hold itself ready with all its power of analysis to interpret the statutes and the construction of constitutions faithfully, as language is written and not as it may be in the mind of the draftsman who wrote it. Wisely in the beginning those who framed our Constitution served notice in the Constitution itself that legislation should originate here, although it could be recommended by the Executive. The right of interpretation and construction was given to the judiciary.

Now, then, to have this piece of legislation presented to the Executive and to obtain his unqualified approval has an effect, as was exhibited here for several days, exceedingly remarkable. We know that the Executive of the United States, now and at all times, has a great influence upon the legislators on either side of the Chamber, Democratic and Republican. So that when a piece of finished legislation has been presented and the President says he approves of all of it we know what is liable to happen. Those who are his political supporters will feel bound to aid in its passage; others are disinclined in war times to vigorously oppose or criticize.

I was very much interested in the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. FITZGERALD], who stood here this afternoon and with great eloquence and power defended the functions and prerogatives of the President of the United States. It would have been interesting had he with equal force defended the prerogatives of this House, which his leadership makes incumbent upon him and his coleaders to do. Among other things, the distinguished chairman said:

The President of the United States, when a provision to create such a committee was proposed in the food bill in another body, wrote a letter to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], in which he said:

"The constant supervision of executive action which it contemplates would amount to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the executive work of the administration."

Under our policy, before the administration or the executive department of the Government can initiate any policy that involves public expenditure it must first submit its recommendations to the legislative body, and the authority to initiate the policy must be provided by legislative action. After the policy has been initiated by legislative action the administration, or the Executive, must submit to the Congress the proposals of expenditure it proposes to make in order to carry the policies into effect.

Well, the President, as soon as he heard we thought of encroaching upon his prerogatives, notified us to "keep off the grass"; but when the Secretary and a part of the judiciary combined to usurp the functions of legislation we did not see leadership here standing up for the functions and prerogatives of this House in the way that a good healthy realization of the situation would prompt it to be done.

The following is a history of this legislation:

On the 31st day of July, 1917, the Secretary of the Treasury addressed a letter to the President of the United States, accompanied by a completed draft of the bill, which later found its way in to this House.

The following is a copy of the introductory features of the letter:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, July 31, 1917.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In accordance with your direction, I have made a careful study of the question of compensation, indemnity, and insurance for the officers and enlisted men of the military and naval forces of the United States.

In this work the Treasury Department was represented by Assistant Secretary Rowe, Mr. William C. De Lanoy, Director of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, and Mr. Hendon Chubb, chairman of the advisory board of that bureau.

I have had the cordial cooperation of the committee on labor of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, Mr. Samuel Gompers, chairman. Mr. Gompers appointed a special subcommittee on compensation for enlisted men and their dependents, of which the Hon. Julian W. Mack, United States circuit judge, was made chairman.

The bill which I am submitting for your consideration was drafted by Judge Mack. Capt. S. H. Wolfe, detailed by the Secretary of War both to the committee on labor and to this department for cooperation in the work, has been very helpful. Representatives from other departments, as well as an advisory draft committee of the committee on labor, have assisted. The Department of Commerce was represented by Assistant Secretary Edwin F. Sweet, the Navy Department by Maj. Henry Leonard, and the Department of Labor by Miss Julia C. Lathrop.

The advisory committee included Mr. P. Tecumseh Sherman, Mr. J. W. Sullivan, Mr. Frank Whiting, Mr. F. Spencer Baldwin, and Mr. D. L. Coase, and was aided by Mr. Everitt Macy, Mr. A. Parker Nevins, and Dr. Lee K. Frankel, members of the executive committee of the committee on labor, and others. The legislative drafting bureau, through Mr. Beeman, also rendered valuable aid.

After Judge Mack had completed a revision of the bill I submitted the measure to the advisory committee of insurance representatives appointed as a result of the insurance conference held July 2.

WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

The President's reply follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 7, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have examined the inclosed papers very carefully and take pleasure in returning them with my entire approval.

Faithfully, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HOB. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Here is a draft of legislation prepared and presented to the Executive for approval before any Congressman was aware that such legislation was proposed. A propaganda throughout the country was started in favor of the legislation before the bill was actually introduced in the House of Representatives.

Concerning the persons named as having aided in drafting the measure, it can without impugning their motives or questioning their sincerity be said: First. Only one ever had any legislative experience, and he but a brief one; further, he is the only one who favored treating all men alike. Second. That although the measure was professedly drawn in the interest of the conscript army, no private soldier of this or any prior war participated in or was consulted in the drafting of the measure.

The first above-emphasized fact is important in this that the volunteer draftsman of legislation is under no oath or obligation to view the questions arising under all angles, and especially under the angle of the interested though absent and unrepresented conscript private. The duly obligated representative under his oath would have been impelled to consult the interest of the conscript nonopulent private as the large factor of the Army. It was for this reason that all our pension legislation, heretofore having been written by Congressmen and developed in congressional committees, recognized the democracy of the Army during the life of its members, and continued that democracy in the pension allowance to his surviving dependents after his death.

It was probably due—unconsciously, perhaps—to the absence from the committee of any man who had shouldered a musket or walked the picket line, to the presence in the committee of the two Army officers, and to the participation of three other members educated in Germany that the officers and soldiers of means were especially favored in the terms of the bill.

The Secretary in his letter speaks of the pension system as exceeding in cost the proposed plan. If that be approximately correct, then the important difference lies in the changed system of distribution. Assuming the disbursements during the life of the soldier or officer to be the same so far as pensions or compensations are concerned, then there remains but two principal features of difference.

These features are, first, compensation for death. The bill as drafted and presented, instead of recognizing the leveling of the grave, proposed to perpetuate the pay and the rank of the officer who entered the service voluntarily, who was highly paid, and who could practically resign at will by generous payments to his surviving dependents. On the other hand, the conscript, who was taken from his home and business against his will, with his employment, trade, or business left in disorder and to neglect, was given to understand that his surviving loved ones should receive a comparatively small allowance. This, of course, is the system followed by militaristic governments, such as the one against which we fight.

The way the House, having opportunity to debate this, fell upon it and removed the unrighteous discrimination made some of us think that we were going to make our own Army safe for democracy before it started upon its European quest for application of the same principle throughout the world. This amendment saved hundreds of votes for the measure upon its final passage.

The private's basic pay is $30 per month. The officer's pay runs up into the hundreds, but nothing over $200 per month need be considered here.

The following is the section as provided in the bill, but whose inequalities were cut out by the Black amendment:

Sec. 301. If death results from injury:
If the deceased leaves a widow or child, or if he leaves a widowed mother substantially dependent upon him for support, the monthly compensation shall be the following percentages of his pay:

- (a) For a widow alone, 25 per cent, but not less than $30.
- (b) For a widow and one child, 35 per cent, but not less than $40.
- (c) For a widow and two children, 50 per cent, but not less than $50, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $5, for each additional child up to two.
- (d) If there be no widow, then for one child 20 per cent, but not less than $15.
- (e) For two children, 30 per cent, but not less than $25.
- (f) For three children, forty per cent, but not less than $35, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $10, for each additional child up to two.
- (g) For a widowed mother, 20 per cent, but not less than $25. The amount payable under this subdivision shall not be greater than a sum which, when added to the total amount payable to the widow and children, does not exceed 50 per cent of the pay, or $60, whichever is the greater. This compensation shall be payable for the death of but one child, and no compensation for the death of a child shall be payable if such widowed mother is in receipt of compensation under the provisions of this article for the death of her husband.

The maximum monthly compensation for death shall be $200.

The second fundamental injustice in the bill is found in the insurance section. Now, this section is the one in the bill that is wholly novel and the one which should have received the most complete and searching investigation and debate. Yet when this section was reached debate was practically shut off.

As the compensation feature would perpetuate rank beyond the grave, the insurance feature establishes an aristocracy of rank and wealth in the Army making 25 per cent aristocrats and 75 per cent plebeians. I use the 25 per cent as that seems to be the general estimate of the experts as to the number who will probably take this insurance.

To make up this 25 per cent there will be, first, the officers of advanced age who could not get insurance anywhere else; second, the officers generally who can afford to pay for the insurance; third, the forehanded, thrifty soldier who will want to buy as many thousand dollars of insurance as he can get, paying $8 in money for $58 in insurance value.

This would leave the conscript soldier, generally representing 75 per cent, without the insurance, after being forced into the Army and without power of resignation, while the officer of greater age, who went in as a matter of choice, drawing a large salary and with general right to resign any time he saw fit, would be paying $30 to the Government for insurance which was worth $580 to him.

Would it not be better to divide that $500 gift up among four men than give it to a person not needing it? A policy of $2,500 granted each man in the Army would be better and more democratic than to let one-fourth of them have $10,000. The theory of the bill is to give to him who does not need and withhold from him who does.

REASON FOR TALK NOW.

The Fitzgerald defense of presidential prerogative.

Somebody should defend our own.

The bill was necessary on account of an enlarged Army and forced foreign service.

What should have been the policy the President recommended.

We had the machinery in the Pension Office; we should have used it.

But it seems that for reasons with which all are familiar for the last 50 years the Pension Office should be discredited. Hence they are not going to be left to the uncertain chances of future legislation or to the scandals of our old legislation.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SLOAN. I yield.

Mr. HERSEY. When we have passed a compensation law it is simply a pension law, and we have attempted to do it in a liberal manner; and I assume the gentleman approved the amount of the compensation as reasonable?

Mr. SLOAN. I did not disapprove it. It came near enough to meeting my approval.

Mr. HERSEY. Then, in addition to that, we gave an insurance policy in case of death or injury, in installments. We were simply increasing the pension when we did that, were we not?

Mr. SLOAN. I think so.

Mr. HERSEY. And when we took away from the private and commandeered of his wages $20 a month, to be sent to his family, and did not touch a cent of the pay received by the commissioned officers of the Army, but gave them all their salary, and gave them also the right to take out $10,000 insurance, does not the gentleman think this bill is in the interest not of the rank and file of men who serve as privates but of the commissioned officers only?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes, I think that is well stated. And that is one of the main points in my speech, that this bill was drafted by men who knew nothing about the subject from the soldier's standpoint and seemed to care less.

If you will go to Who's Who, and follow their careers there, you will find that at least three of them were educated in Germany, but not one of them was educated on the picket line. These men drafted a bill of which they were not under oath to consider every side and every phase. Every Congressman here in drafting a bill, whether he had ever been a soldier or not, would have endeavored to place himself in the position of a private soldier first and the officer afterwards.

Mr. McKEOWN. I will ask the gentleman from Nebraska if it was not explained that the bill as introduced was based on the idea of a compensation bill? And I will ask if it is not a fact that all compensation measures regulate the amount of money to be received according to the earning capacity of the party injured? That is to say, a foreman receives a larger compensation than a laborer in the works.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; if we put it on the sordid, ordinary commercial and laboring basis, and not on the high and soldierlike basis that we should in such a measure as this.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I do.

Mr. PLATT. To some extent I agree with what the gentleman has said; but at the same time the men in the ranks in the Army have everything found. The money they get is clear. They can do anything they want to do with it. They can spend the whole $30 on insurance if they want to, while the officers have to buy a variety of expensive uniforms, their food and everything, and support their families besides; and as a matter of real fact, if you knew their families, many of them are worse off than the men are, because they have to spend their money while the men have nothing that they are obliged to spend money on. The soldiers do spend money, of course, some of them to their own harm. Some of them buy extra food, but they do not need to. A man in France can send home $30 a month if he wants to. I talked only day before yesterday with an officer who had returned from France, and he told me he had put on deposit for his company—he was a captain when he went over there—something like $2,500, which shows that a good many of the soldiers are thrifty and saving, and have money for insurance.

Mr. SLOAN. I presume that is true, but the officer has a large salary compared with the others, and if he is in hard straits it is due to a special misfortune or his own improvidence. The very fact that every man desires to be an officer on account of the rank and the money answers the gentleman from New York. Men who are given the opportunity to take this insurance, confined to the 25 per cent of all of them, as the actuary said it would be, would be first the officers who have the foresight, and then the thrifty men. If I was in the Army and I could get a hundred thousand insurance at $8 per thousand, as a matter of business I would take it, and so would every other man. The Government would not be out any more if it would furnish a $2,500 policy to every soldier from what it would be to furnish a $10,000 policy to every one of this preferred class who desires to take it, and the purpose of the insurance would be subverted. If the Senate will radically amend this insurance provision which gives favor to rank and wealth, as the House smashed the attempt to carry rank beyond the grave in compensation following death, the measure will be vastly improved, and this hope prompts me to vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I asked for recognition in order to request unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a speech by the Hon. William Kent, an ex-Member of Congress, now a member of the Tariff Commission, delivered at the Washington conference on the high cost of living.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] one hour.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, this war session of Congress began April 2. This is the sixth month of its duration. It has been a trying session for every one of the Members. Good men have had honest differences. Some men have talked too much; some have not talked at all. Some have made the sessions hideous and the country weary with their toilsome speeches; others have contented themselves with studying their conscience, studying the interests of our country, and doing rather than speaking. No thoughtful Member of either branch of the Congress could have enjoyed this session. Each and every man here would have been glad to have been spared the bitter cup of launching a great Nation into war. Peace has ever been a passion with this Nation. It has been our hope by day and our dream by night. It was the hope of our President during the toilsome two and a half years that Germany made warfare upon us; it was the hope of the Congress that the country might remain at peace and that Germany might cease her hostilities toward us. It was the hope of the teeming millions of the Republic that peace, good will, and prosperity might go on uninterrupted, that our boys might remain at home, that our Treasury might not be drained. But it was an honorable peace and a lasting peace that we sought, not a momentary or dishonorable one. But it was of no avail.

Theaters and churches for two and a half years next preceding the war were opened with prayers, supplications, and appeals for neutrality and avoidance of war. Still all of this met deaf ears. Insolence, outrageous and continued indignities, were the only replies.

In the short time I will engage your attention it will be free from any effort at oratory, rainbow rhetoric, or high-sounding phrases. It is too serious a matter to do more than deal with sturdy facts. It will be an effort to make plain, first, the causes of the war; second, the conduct of the war; and, third, the trouble, disaster, humiliation, and disintegration that would have ensued from a course of submission.

First. I assert the war to be an unavoidable and just war. Second. I assert it has been efficiently and intelligently carried on by Woodrow Wilson and the Congress. Third. I assert this Nation would have been bowed down in shame and dishonor had we pursued any other course than the one pursued.

CAUSES OF THE WAR.

Prior to our advent into the war and before the passage of the war resolution Germany by her submarine warfare sank 1,276 merchant ships. Of these, 425 were neutral ships; 19 were American ships. These ships were sunk while they were going where they had the right to go, doing what they had the right to do, carrying on legitimate errands on the sea, and only asking to be let alone. These ships were carrying the products of America's fields, forests, mines, and factories to the markets of the world. Nineteen of these ships carried the starry banner of the Republic. The sorrowful part of it all is that when these ships were torpedoed without warning and ended up to take their last plunge to the bottom they could not go alone.

They did not go alone. They carried with them thousands of lives of unsuspecting citizens who had not offended, who were engaged in legitimate business transactions, and 225 of whom were our own American citizens, who were asking only to be protected in their undoubted rights and that they be allowed to do the thing that under the laws of land and sea they had a perfect right to do. When our forefathers declared war on England in the stormy days of the Revolution England had sunk none of our ships, England had murdered none of our citizens. Still, our forefathers, who loved liberty, loved freedom, and were jealous of their undoubted rights, declared their independence, went to war, won the war, because England sought to tax us and oppress us without allowing us to have representation. We were not then confronted with a closed sea, a congested commerce, 19 American merchant ships willfully sunk, 225 American citizens torpedoed—drowned, murdered without warning and without a chance.

GERMANY'S CLOSING OF THE SEA TO AMERICAN COMMERCE.

On January 31, 1917, Germany issued a formal warning and notice that a zone 1,200 miles long and 1,000 miles wide along the west coast of Europe should thereafter be closed to us, and that any ship entering the same would be torpedoed and sunk without warning. The President, the Congress, and the American people could not believe Germany intended to carry out this threat. Through this zone last year three-fifths of our export commerce passed. Through this zone last year passed two-thirds of our export wheat products, five-sixths of our hog products, six-sevenths of our cotton products, seven-eighths of our beef products, three-fifths of our tobacco products—

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the situation as to Russia show the hardship in closing the seas to exports?

Mr. FERRIS. It certainly does. We were told the farmers have no interest in the war, but they do not tell the truth. If the seas are closed, the farmers' market is closed. If the market is closed, the price of farm products goes down.

What was true of farm products was likewise true of manufactured products. What was true of manufactured products was likewise true of mining products. This meant practically a closing of the sea to American commerce, a stifling of American institutions, depression to the six and a half million farmers, loss of employment to 20,000,000 toilers, bankruptcy to business, and general disaster and humiliation to our country. Thoughtful men in and out of Congress did not believe that Germany would carry out this dastardly program. They did carry it out; they are carrying it out. The order still stands. It has never been recalled.

NAMES OF AMERICAN SHIPS SENT TO BOTTOM.

Under this program, America prior to the declaration of war has lost the following citizens and ships: Armenian, with 23 Americans; Iberian, with 3 Americans; Anglo-Californian, with 2 Americans; Hesperian, with 1 American; Arabic, with 3 Americans; Persia, with 2 Americans; Ancona, with 7 Americans; Englishman, with 6 Americans; Sabota, with 1 American; Marina, with 8 Americans; Russian, with 17 Americans; Eveston, with 1 American; Vedamore, with 10 Americans; Turino, with 1 American; Athos, with 1 American; Lacona, with 8 Americans; Sjostad, with 1 American; Vigilancia, with 5 Americans; Haldton, with 7 Americans; and the Crispin, with 19 Americans.

NEUTRAL AND BELLIGERENT NATIONS ALIKE ARE DRIVEN FROM THE SEA.

Under this program, prior to our declaration of war, the following nations have lost the following ships:

Norway, 410; Italy, 137; France, 90; Denmark, 44; England, 369; Holland, 61; Greece, 50; Sweden, 111; Spain, 33; Russia, 24; United States, 18; Portugal, 6; Belgium, 5; Peru, 1; Brazil, 1; Japan, 1; Argentina, 1.

Was it the wish of the six and a half million farmers of the Republic, who produce more each year than they themselves consume, that their President and their Congress submit to a closing of the sea and a corresponding depression of prices for farm products? Was it the wish of the American farmer that the President and the Congress allow the sea to be closed and the American Republic to be humiliated, depressed, disintegrated, and destroyed? Was it the wish of the 20,000,000 toilers of the Republic who work for daily or monthly wage that their Government refuse to protect not only their commerce but their brother workmen both on land and sea? Was it the wish of the throbbing, teeming millions of the Republic that we grab our hats and run from duty when duty seemed so plain? Would they want it to be written in history that America dare not protect its citizens anywhere and everywhere? Were they willing for the peace and quietude of the moment to abandon their hopes for a lasting and permanent peace? Would they feel that such a course would be honorable and worthy of a Republic conceived in liberty, where every man is free? No; I can not believe it! I do not believe it!

I believe it was the wish of the American producer, the American toiler, the American manufacturer that the President and the Congress first plead for peace, pray for peace, argue for peace, insist upon peace, but failing in that to stand erect to duty unflinchingly, unflatteringly until liberty, justice, democracy, equality is able to travel anywhere on land and sea without impediment, without interruption, without submarining, without torpedoing, without drowning, without murder, and without death.

ZIMMERMANN PLOT—SEEKING TO DISMEMBER REPUBLIC—GERMAN INTRIGUES TO INVOLVE THE UNITED STATES IN WAR WITH MEXICO AND JAPAN.

The Government of the United States is in possession of instructions addressed by the German minister for foreign affairs to the German minister to Mexico concerning a proposed alliance of Germany, Japan, and Mexico to make war on the United States. The text of this document is as follows:

BERLIN, January 19, 1917.

On the 1st of February we intend to begin submarine warfare unrestricted. In spite of this it is our intention to endeavor to keep neutral the United States of America.

If this attempt is not successful, we propose an alliance on the following basis with Mexico: That we shall make war together and together make peace. We shall give general financial support, and it is understood that Mexico is to reconquer the lost territory in New Mexico, Texas, and Arizona. The details are left to you for settlement.

You are instructed to inform the President of Mexico of the above in the greatest confidence as soon as it is certain there will be an outbreak of war with the United States, and suggest that the President of Mexico on his own initiative should communicate with Japan suggesting adherence at once to this plan; at the same time offer to mediate between Germany and Japan.

Please call to the attention of the President of Mexico that the employment of ruthless submarine warfare now promises to compel England to make peace in a few months.

(Signed) ZIMMERMANN.

This discloses beyond any doubt, this discloses beyond contradiction that Germany was seeking by intrigue, sinister motives, fraud, deceit, and wantonness to dismember our very Republic and carve from our very boundaries the States of Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico. This shows conclusively that Germany was holding up a portion of our Republic as a prize to induce supposedly hostile nations to fight us, to make war upon us, and join them in an attack upon us. The fact that their efforts along this line aborted does not relieve them of the viciousness of their intent; it does not lessen the gravity of their offense. It merely shows that Germany intended by concerted action not alone to crush and rule all Europe but America as well, and to ram down the throat of liberty and democracy everywhere Prussianism and Kaiserism.

How long, pray tell, has it been since the sons of liberty can sit pacific while hostile powers offer three sovereign States of the Republic as a prize to induce other nations to attack us? How long was this proud Republic expected to follow the dim and flickering lamp of pacifism, inaction, submission, and no preparation, which was counseling no action, no resentment, no objection to such infamous conduct? If Germany is permitted to offer three sovereign States of the Union as a prize to accomplish our undoing, pray tell what her next offering may be. No one knows if we submitted to partial vivisection to-day of our Republic that to-morrow the vivisection and disintegration may not be complete.

DEMOCRACY IN DEATH GRAPPLE WITH MILITARISM, PRUSSIANISM, AND KAISERISM.

Prussianism as carried on by the Kaiser threatens civilization from turret to foundation stone. Germany began the war;

Germany has continued the war; Germany has been the aggressor every day. Every protestation of a desire for peace has been fraudulent and untrue; every protestation or proffer of peace has been to disrupt, defraud, take advantage, and without good faith. What principle of public law, public property, public morals, treaty stipulations, or sacred family relations has escaped his mailed fist and iron heel? What citizen of any country has escaped his tyranny and abuse? What right of neutral nations has he not abrogated and invaded in his three years of warfare, that is crimson with crimes hitherto unheard of? In all wars of recorded history civilized nations have shown respect for art and religion. All Europe and her ancient cities and institutions are replete with corroboration of this statement. All of them bear solemn witness that they have escaped both the ravages of time and war until now.

Not so with poor, pleading, bleeding Belgium; not so with poor, invaded northern France. Churches of God were burned to the ground and left in ashes. Chaste women were murdered, ravished, and destroyed; children were left cringing, to die untended, mutilated, and alone; homes were left in ashes; children were left with severed hands; communities were left with hopes blasted; citizens were torpedoed, submarined, and drowned. All this was inflicted upon citizens whose only crime consisted of their desire to be let alone, to live, to be industrious, and worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience. Let your sympathy, for well you may, reach out to the fallen cities of Liege, Louvain, and Rheims. Can there be such another page in all history? Poor, cringing, poverty-stricken, hunger-stricken Armenia; her citizenship slaughtered by the thousands because they dared to worship their meek and lowly Savior in their humble way. They died because they dared to follow their own conscience.

Was it the wish of America's citizenship that their President and their Congress turn a deaf ear to this wantonness and crime? Was it their wish that we longer plead for neutrality and abstain from resentment? Was it written in the patriotic hearts of 100,000,000 freemen that their President and their Congress would submit to this conduct and continue to hope that liberty and free government may not perish? Was it their wish that America—the second oldest of the 26 republics of the world—should not stand erect, take a man's part in the battle for liberty and justice of mankind? Was it their thought that by avoiding trouble to-day we could have peace to-morrow? Were the peace and comforts of the day greater in their eyes than a lasting, honorable peace—not alone for us, but for those that succeed us? No; I can not believe this was the verdict of more than a few. No; I can not believe this was the verdict of the patriotic and the thoughtful citizen. I would prefer to believe that such a verdict could not long find lodgment in the minds of thoughtful, patriotic men who respect their Government, their flag, their country, their institutions, and their traditions. [Applause.]

TAFT, ROOSEVELT, WILSON—ALL RECOGNIZED THE NECESSITY OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

Ex-President William H. Taft, ex-Governor General of the Philippines, ex-Secretary of War, ex-Federal judge, ripe in experience, thoughtful, patriotic, just, appealed not once but many times to his country to awake from its slumbers and be up and doing. His recent speeches, his writings all embody urgent appeals to his country to act, long before President Wilson or the Congress did act. [Applause.]

A short paragraph embracing his views taken from a speech on February 5, 1917, may not be out of place:

We have no desire for difficulty with Germany and have done her no wrong, yet she, in violation of our rights, proposes to do that which, if we value our honor and our vital interests, we must resist by force. There is nothing else for a self-respecting nation of moral principle to do.

Ex-President Roosevelt, who served the Republic seven years as its President; Vice President; colonel of the Rough Riders in the late war; always brave, militant, and gallant, and whose hold on the American people is without parallel in the history of the world, felt that America had waited too long to avenge the wrongs that were heaped upon American liberty and the world. By his every word, by his every writing during this war he has plead for action. His fears were of our waiting, not of our acting. His fears were for his country. A single paragraph from him and the necessity of war may not be out of place. On March 23, 1917, he said:

We have stood for peace up to the point—and beyond the point—where peace parted company with fealty to our national honor and with our performance of international duty. As things are now any man who is a pacifist is false to the honor and the interest of the United States and of mankind.

President Woodrow Wilson, the brave, gallant, courageous, daring, intrepid President, with pale face and drawn features for two and a half years plead almost with hat in hand on bended knee that Germany might spare us the calamities of war, after two and a half years of invaded rights; submarining, closing of seas, treachery, humility, arson, outrages, rape, and shame. His appeals and prayers for neutrality will go down in history as the most earnest and persistent of all time. President Wilson, among other things, came before the Congress on April 2, 1917, upon the convening of the extraordinary war Congress, and in words loud and clear said:

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own Governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

WAR DECLARED—CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Senate joint resolution No. 1, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, passed Senate April 4, 1917. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 261.) Forty-five Democrats voted yes, 3 Democrats voted no; 37 Republicans voted yes, 3 Republicans voted no. Passed House April 5, 1917; 373 Members voted yes, 50 Members voted no; 196 Democrats voted yes, 16 Democrats voted no; 177 Republicans voted yes, 32 Republicans voted no. (See p. 412 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) Signed by President Wilson April 6, 1917.

When this resolution was passed and signed it was not a question of peace or war. We already had war. For 2½ years Germany had not only made constant warfare against us, but against liberty, democracy, humanity, and the world. President Wilson had been patient, Congress had been patient, the American people had been patient; but even patience at last had its terminal facilities. [Applause.]

MONEY REQUIRED TO CONDUCT WAR.

Your Congress at once began the task of financing the war. H. R. 2762, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, was introduced. It obligated this Government to the payment of $7,000,000,000 indebtedness for the conduct of the war. This bill passed the House April 14, 1917. Three hundred and eighty-eight Congressmen voted for it and not a single Member voted against it. (See p. 690 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) Passed Senate April 17, 1917. Eighty-four Senators voted yes; not a single Senator failed to support it. (See p. 769 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

This was the largest appropriation bill ever passed by any country during all time. It was the conscripting of dollars and wealth to pay for the war and to carry on a successful war. Not a single dissenting vote. It is the law. The money is being used to raise, train, and equip an army. At the outbreak of the war we had, including all organizations and branches of service, 300,000 men, while Germany had 10,000,000 men.

INSURANCE BILL.

H. R. 5723. Passed House September 13, 1917. Vote—319 voted "yea"; not a single vote against. (See p. 7104, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

This legislation makes it certain to every boy that enters the service that in the event he falls in defense of his country his family will be provided for and free from want. It does more than that. It affords him also an accident insurance, so if he is maimed or disabled it is made certain for him that he will not be left penniless and alone. That he may begin anew. That he may again enter society and business instead of the almshouse. Is this too much to do? Will there be those who will begrudge our defenders this much? We are proud there was not one vote against it. This is but common justice from a great and generous Government to the brave boys who are going across 3,000 miles of a sea to defend us and do a man's part toward upholding liberty throughout the world. They have the hardest part. They offer their lives. We can only offer such comforts, safety, and assurance as taxes and dollars will buy. [Applause.]

ELEVEN-BILLION-DOLLAR BOND BILL.

H. R. 5901. Passed House September 6, 1917. No roll call. (See p. 6708 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

This vast sum was the largest amount of revenue ever provided for in one bill by any country in all history to afford every comfort and security both at home and abroad to our Army. There was no partisanship or quibbling. It was necessary. It was duty. No one enjoys voting taxes and burdens on the citizen, but war is never pleasant—it is duty. It is not pleasant for judges, juries, and prosecutors to inflict prosecutions, penalties, and sentences, but it is often necessary. It is often duty. It is seldom pleasant. [Applause.]

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

At the close of President Roosevelt's last administration there were, including all military organizations of every sort and kind, including Reserve Corps and all, 207,067 men in the Army. At the close of the Taft administration there were 211,914 men in the Army. At the close of the first four years of the Wilson administration the Army numbered 323,171 men. To-day in our three armies, the Regulars, the National Guard, and the National Army, we have more than a million men under colors and in training to defend us. It was not pleasant to raise this army from our brave boys, but it was necessary. An army of 300,000 men could not fight an army of 10,000,000 men. Some were willing to fight, some unwilling; but it was duty—it was necessary. [Applause.]

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

At the close of the last Roosevelt administration we had in the Navy 55,548 men; at the close of the Taft administration we had 55,056; at the close of President Wilson's first administration we had 96,427. At the present time there are 163,184 men in the Navy, including 21,000 reserves. The authorized strength of the Navy is 162,462, exclusive of reserves. We were gaining slowly.

FIGHTING SHIPS OF ALL SORTS.

At the close of the Roosevelt administration we had 96 ships of all sorts and kinds. At the close of the Taft administration we had 197. At the close of President Wilson's first term we had 259, with countless hundreds under course of construction in all the navy yards of the country. [Applause.]

METHOD OF RAISING AN ARMY—SELECTIVE-DRAFT LAW.

H. R. 3545, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session; passed House April 27, 1917; yeas 397, nays 24. (See p. 1557, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) Passed Senate April 28, 1917; yeas 81, nays 8. (See p. 1501, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) Signed by President Wilson May 18, 1917.

Wars can not be fought without men. The Congress was confronted with the duty of raising an army. We had an Army of 116,000 Regulars and a few scattering National Guardsmen, while Germany had an army of 10,000,000 men.

Mr. QUIN. I think the gentleman wants the record clear. We had 140,000 men additional in the shape of militia.

Mr. FERRIS. I said we had 116,000 Regulars, and then we had guardsmen. The gentleman knows more about it than I, and I am perfectly willing to say that they were seasoned and trained. But even so, what does that small number amount to and what do you expect of them as against a foe that has 10,000,000 soldiers under the colors and in reserve?

Conscription is not new; it is as old as the Republic itself. The first conscription law was advocated by George Washington. He made no less than five separate and distinct appeals that it be enacted. Both North and South, under Lincoln and Lee, resorted to it in the Civil War. It was not pleasant then, but it was necessary.

Thomas Jefferson was for the draft; former President Taft was ardently for the draft; former President Roosevelt was for the draft; President Wilson was for the draft; the Secretary of War was for the draft.

Out of a total of 435 Congressmen, on a final vote only 24 voted against selective-draft service. Out of a total of 96 Senators, only 8 voted against selective draft on final vote. This was after full consideration. This was after able men had ably presented both sides. This was not a hasty opinion, but a mature one. It is now in process of raising an efficient and adequate army, which was both necessary and indispensable.

GOVERNORS OF STATES FOR DRAFT.

Practically every one of the 48 governors declared themselves in favor of the selective-draft service. It seemed the fairest. It treated all alike. It was necessary. They were close to the people. They knew of the frailties of the voluntary plan in working with the guard. They knew it was necessary. They knew we were without an Army and that we must have one.

Good men in and out of Congress halted and were in doubt at first at the advisability of the draft, but when it was observed that it provided that each community should furnish their pro rata part and that it had the support of every student of the subject, and when it was remembered that it was not quite right to let the warm-hearted patriots do all the fighting and the laggards none, it was finally seized upon by your Congress as the most equitable, just, and efficient manner to aid your President to lead the Republic against the mightiest military force in all the world.

Good men in and out of Congress had a perfect right to differ about its enactment. That was clearly their right. But to continue to oppose it and encourage agitation against it is but to hamper your President, your Congress, and your country—a thing no good man ought to do. To oppose it and obstruct it is to say that you are unwilling to abide by a law that your Congress has passed and that your President has signed. This can but breed dissension within; this can but lend aid to the enemy without; this can but obstruct your President, your Congress, your country, while it is in peril and in the balance.

Some people in and out of Congress are seeking to obstruct and break down this law. But some of them would seek to break down and obstruct any law. Some people in and out of Congress are bringing about riots and disturbances concerning this law. But these same people would obstruct and create disturbance about any law that did not meet their fancy. Certain of society are rebellious of this law, but they would be rebellious of any law of which they did not approve. This is but the course of any law violator in any clime at any time, and I can not believe there can be many such violators or that the Nation will look with much toleration upon their several violations of it. [Applause.]

I shall not say that it was a pleasant task for the Congress to enact a conscription law. I shall not say that it is ever pleasant to force citizens to perform any act either for themselves or for their Government by compulsion, but what I do say is that it was a necessary thing to do. There are also unpleasant things attendant to the voluntary system, as well as to the selective-draft system. For example, under the volunteer system during the civil war youths of tender years neglected their education, neglected their all, to enlist in the war. The War Department has compiled a list of men who served in the Civil War, by groups, and they are as follows:

10 years and under	25
11 years	13
12 years	187
13 years	75
14 years	1,223
15 years	104,464
16 years	125,064
17 years	613,840
18 years	306,547
19 years to 21 years	1,008,380
22 years to 24 years	571,855
25 years to 43 years	80,555
44 years and over	16,071

I shall not by word or thought cast one aspersion upon the volunteer soldier. The volunteer soldier is the salt of the earth—God bless him and increase his tribe. But what I will say is that the volunteer system is not without its impedimenta, objections, and hardships. For example, the War Department has compiled a list of bounties paid by the several States that became necessary to secure soldiers to fight the cause of the Union. The list by States is no less than astounding. It is as follows:

Maine	$7,837,000
New Hampshire	9,600,000
Vermont	4,500,000
Massachusetts	22,900,000
Rhode Island	820,000
Connecticut	6,800,000
New York	89,600,000
New Jersey	23,868,000
Pennsylvania	43,000,000
Delaware	1,000,000
Maryland	6,000,000
District of Columbia	134,000
West Virginia	864,000
Kentucky	692,000
Ohio	23,500,000
Indiana	9,000,000
Illinois	17,000,000
Michigan	9,600,000
Wisconsin	5,800,000
Iowa	1,600,000
Minnesota	2,000,000
Missouri	1,200,000
Kansas	57,000

LINCOLN'S ELOQUENT LETTER TO MRS. BIXBY.

During the progress of the Civil War that great man in the White House, the lamented Lincoln, wrote this letter to a mother up in New England. It is dated Executive Mansion, Washington, November 21, 1864, and is written to Mrs. Bixby, Boston, Mass.:

DEAR MADAM: I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the adjutant general of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any word of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I can not refrain from tendering you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

Yours, very sincerely and respectfully,

A. LINCOLN.

Who is there by word or thought that believes that this widowed mother should furnish five boys to give up their lives in defense of their country while the next-door neighbor keeps their boys at home, refuses to let them serve, thereby enabling them to profit by the going of the widow's sons? [Applause.]

It has been charged that this war with Germany is an unjust war because a large percentage of the registered men have applied for exemption. The facts are that all wars are unpopular. Duty is often unpopular, though none the less necessary; compulsory education is often unpopular, but who would abolish it? Courts of justice are often unpopular and do unpopular things that society and good government may be secure, yet who would abolish them? It became necessary not only in the Civil War for both the North and the South to pass draft legislation, but in addition to that pay bounties that are unseemly and improper.

FOOD BILL.

H. R. 4961, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session. Conference report agreed to in the House on the 3d day of August, 1917; 359 voted "yea," none voted "nay." (See p. 5768, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 3, 1917.) Passed Senate on the 8th day of August, 1917; 66 voted "yea," 7 voted "nay." (See p. 5927 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) Signed by President Wilson August 10, 1917.

Congress has just enacted and the President has just signed a bill appropriating $150,000,000 to aid the President in ridding the country of food gamblers and gamblers in food products. Under that a food administrator has just been appointed, who, in turn, has fixed the price of wheat at $2.20 per bushel for the 1917 crop.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. McKEOWN. I desire to ask my colleague if, when he speaks of legislation fixing prices, he means to convey the idea that the $2 fixed by Congress is the maximum price?

Mr. FERRIS. No; that is the minimum price by legislation. The board appointed by the President fixed it at $2.20 for the 1917 crop.

The act itself for the 1918 crop fixes the minimum price at $2 per bushel. The 20,000,000 toilers of the country who are consumers and not producers think this price too high. Some of the producers of the country think it is too low. The consumer is insisting that the average price of wheat for the last 51 years, as shown by the Agricultural Yearbook, from 1866 up to 1917, has been 86.41 cents per bushel. The food administrator is justified in this marked increase in the average price for the last 50 years on two grounds. First. Every implement the farmer uses has greatly increased in cost; the labor the farmer hires has greatly increased; the price of production has undoubtedly increased. Second. The war has inflated the price of everything, and while I am perfectly sure the farmer does not want to practice extortion upon American consumers who buy his products due to temporary shortage and war, it is no more than right that the price of his products be not reduced below the cost of production and a reasonable profit to the producer. The fixing of an arbitrary price has and will to some extent disarrange business; it has and will to some extent displease some producers and some consumers, but it is felt certain by those who have given thought to the subject that both producer and consumer are safer and will be more certain of an open, honest, and stable market on which to buy and sell when the matter is being administered by the Government, rather than by unscrupulous food speculators, who have an eye single to percentage and profiteering. [Applause.]

NOT A SINGLE VOTE AGAINST FOOD BILL.

When this bill passed the House, 355 voted for it; not a single vote against it. When it passed the Senate, 66 voted for it, 7 against it. This legislation was made necessary by the war. Hungry families, on one hand, were asking Congress to relieve them from the extortionate prices. On the other hand, grasping, penurious speculators were holding up the bony hand of protest and objecting to its passage. They had forgotten their patriotism. They had forgotten their country. They had become involved in percentage and profiteering. The fuel speculators preferred to go and buy coal in midsummer at $5 a ton and sell it to shivering families in midwinter at $10 a ton. Wheat speculators preferred to go on buying the farmers' wheat from the thrashing machine at 75 cents a bushel, holding it, hoarding it, juggling it, and selling it back to the farmer and the consuming public throughout the year in the form of flour at two and three dollars a bushel. This proceeding was intolerable enough in peace times and surely unjustifiable in war times. [Applause.]

I have long thought both the producing and consuming public in peace times were entitled to an honest and an open market on which to buy and sell food, feed, and fuel. Surely it is not too much for the teeming millions of the Republic to ask that a great and a just Government afford them this in war times. [Applause.]

If a million and more brave boys are to make their last offer in defense of their Republic; if they are to cross 3,000 miles of submarine-infested deep that democracy may live; if they are to have it written in history that we are not the puny sons of noble sires, it is not too much to ask that a great and just Government do not allow speculators and gamblers in farm products to practice extortion on their families while they are gone and reap harvests of extortion as a result of their going. For me and mine, I shall take my stand with President Wilson, with the Congress, and the teeming millions of the Republic, and do what I can to make men forget percentages during this war and bring about its early and successful conclusion. [Applause.]

For me and mine, I shall do what I can that justice be meted out to the selfish food gamblers of the Republic, and that at the earliest possible date. For me and mine, I shall pray and hope that President Wilson is equal to the great task he has undertaken of eliminating speculation, stimulating production, and furnishing an open and an honest market to both producer and consumer throughout the war. [Applause.]

AEROPLANE BILL.

House bill 5326 passed House July 14, 1917, without a roll call (p. 5143, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD); passed Senate July 21, 1917, without a roll call (p. 5372, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD); signed by President Wilson July 24, 1917.

Under this Congress appropriated $640,000,000 with which the United States is seeking to construct 30,000 aeroplanes to defend us on land and sea. None doubted the wisdom of this enactment. It is our best chance to conserve human life and win the war. [Applause.]

AMERICA HAS NEVER BEEN A MILITARY NATION.

We have preferred to build homes, hospitals, and schoolhouses with our earnings rather than to expend it for armament and military equipment. This course has made us rich in dollars, but poor in military preparedness. We are rich in natural resources, rich in dollars. The Comptroller of the Currency's report shows the resources of the national banks to be greater than the combined resources of the national banks of England, France, Germany, Netherlands, Japan, Russia, and Switzerland. Among the natural resources are our 700,000,000 acres of public land, 165,000,000 acres of forest reserves, 53,000,000 acres of coal land, 5,000,000 acres of oil land, 3,000,000 acres of phosphate and potassium land, and 35,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectric energy. Who is there that will not rejoice at this princely estate still our own, free from monopoly, free from taxation. [Applause.]

RELATIVE STRENGTH OF THE NATIONS AT WAR.

The World Almanac gives the following figures regarding the 26 countries which have either declared war against Germany or have severed diplomatic relations with her. The populations and areas given are accurate. It also shows an estimate of the numerical armed strength, which, of course, must of necessity be unofficial and inaccurate, and which from time to time is modified according to war or the absence of war. The figures will, however, have some value in showing the relative strength and importance of the several countries.

Twenty-six nations have either declared war or severed diplomatic relations with Germany. The population of the combined allied nations is 1,439,759,105; the combined population of the central powers is 144,084,000. The combined area, in square miles, of the allied nations is 39,549,767; the combined area of the central powers is 2,249,858. The armed strength of the allies is 23,285,603; the armed strength of the central powers is 10,600,000.

OVER-SEA FIGHTING.

Certain of our citizens, both in and out of Congress, are objecting to taking soldiers across the sea, even to defend our honor. This may or may not be the excuse of the citizens who prefer not to fight at all and who are in favor of peace at any price. This may or may not be the excuse of men who would measure the honor of the family, the home, and the country in dollars and cents. This may or may not be the excuse of men who would for the comforts of the present abandon a permanent peace. This may or may not be the excuse of men who are willing to have it written in history that our only claim to distinction is that we were born of honored sires. But be that as it may, this question of over-sea fighting is not one of theory or rhetoric. It is one of necessity. For me and mine, I would prefer to have my country fight while we have the aid of six and a half million English soldiers now trained and in the field; while we have the aid of three and a half million French soldiers now in a death grapple for existence. For me and mine, I prefer to have my country avail itself of the service of these 10,000,000 men while they are now able to fight and before they are conquered, to the end that we may not be compelled to fight Germany alone. [Applause.] I have feared that but for our intervention and assistance France and England would have been brought to their knees. Germany would have gained control of the English Navy. America would have been her objective point and through Canada on the north, which she would then control, and through poor wavering Mexico on the south, we would be confronted with an invasion that would call to arms every able-bodied man of the Republic from youth to old age. The feasibility of this view is only strengthened, corroborated, and made certain by the Zimmermann note, wherein Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico were held up as prizes to induce Japan and Mexico to join them in our undoing. The fact that Mexico and Japan stood firm and the effort at our undoing abortive in no way lessens the gravity of their offense.

AMERICA ENTERED THE WAR FOR NO SELFISH PURPOSE.

We entered the war not for dollars, not for empire, not for conquest, nor for hope of reward, but only for the preservation of our modest and undoubted rights. Could any nation enter a war so completely without selfishness and without guile? Ours is a war against crime, submarining, murder, autocracy, militarism. Ours is a war to prevent a war-mad militarist in his onward rushing tide of seeking to first crush the world and then rule it. Ours is a war to preserve liberty, freedom, our institutions, and that free government may not perish. Ours is a war of democracy, for justice, and that not only this Republic but the Republics of the world may live and endure. If we win the war to-morrow, we neither ask nor receive one farthing; if we win the war to-morrow, we neither receive nor ask one acre of land. Is it not, therefore, our bounden duty to obstruct the slanderers, object to the propagandist, and refuse aid and comfort to those who would impede the progress of the country when it is in peril? [Applause.]

PACIFISM.

An old doctrine with a new name has sprung into existence called pacifism. Euphonious in syllables, attractive in its exterior, but unsound at the core. Pacifism means peace at any price. Pacifism is to-day what toryism was during the Revolution. Pacifism is to-day what copperheadism was during the Civil War. Pacifism emerges from the darkness we know not where, while the country is in peril, strikes, and returns to its hidden lair. Pacifism means that the honor of the family, home, and country may be measured in dollars. Such a doctrine shall not find lodgment here, where every man is free and no man dares to wear a crown. The Republic can not successfully follow the dim and flickering light of pacifism. It will but lead us in the pathway of dishonor, to disaster, disintegration, and shame. Let us hope, let us pray, that it will soon return to the darkness whence it came, never again to inject its slimy form into the body politic. [Applause.]

WE MUST WIN THE WAR.

Prussianism, kaiserism, and militarism as conducted by the present German Government threaten civilization itself. They began the war; every day they have been the aggressors. Every peace proposal they have made has been conceived in treachery, fraud, hypocrisy. If Germany succeeds, it will be written in history that democracies are too weak to grapple with monarchy. There are but two sides to this controversy. We must this day choose between the two.

We must win the war, for to lose it is not alone to lose our country but to lose our liberty. [Applause.] To lose the war is to let freedom and liberty welter in the blood of the fathers and to say that free government can not survive. To lose the war is to say that the soldier and not the citizen will make the state. To lose it will mean that liberty will go cringing out the back door, while militarism comes in at the front. To lose it is to say that the battle for liberty is to receive no word of hope from us. It would mean that America is unwilling to defend her citizens in their undoubted rights on land and sea. It would mean that patriotism was not dying but dead.

PEACE.

Peace has always been a passion with me. It has always been a passion with the Republic. But it has been an honorable peace we have sought as distinguished from a dishonorable one. [Applause.]

It has been a lasting peace not a temporary one that our forefathers fought and died for. Peace can not be when war is constantly made upon us. Peace can not be amidst the death groans of the murdered and mutilated. Peace can not be amidst the gurgling sounds of the drowning. Peace can not be when the Starry Banner of the Republic is assaulted, fired upon, submarined, and sunk. Peace can not be when Kaiserism reigns and the very Deity is proselyted and disdained. Peace can not be when democracy is making her last stand and is in a death grapple with autocracy. Peace! There can be no peace but an honorable peace. Peace! There can be no peace but a lasting peace.

Patriotism, the Republic itself rests with you. Kindle it anew! Kindle anew your smoldering embers that patriotism may stalk among us to-day as it did of yore. Kindle anew the patriotism that will defend our liberty, perpetuate our Republic, and preserve our institutions, for we are in the right and they are in the wrong! [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I was one of the number who voted against the war resolution and did what I could to keep my country out of this war. In voicing my opposition to the war resolution I said when this war resolution is passed "it will become the duty of every citizen to uphold the hands of the Executive. Their loyalty, their Americanism, will not be questioned. We will all remain a unit in giving support to the war and will remain a united people with common purposes and common aspirations."

The big revenue bill passed the House on May 23 and the Senate passed it on September 10 and it is now in conference. I desire at this time to make a few comments on this important measure. The greatest problem now before Congress is how to finance the war successfully. It is especially important that all mistakes be avoided in the problem that confronts us. If we blunder now, we impede the progress of our course. If we make mistakes now, they will multiply as we go forward with our plans, and we must pay the penalty for all our blunders.

Under the revenue bill as passed by the House it was estimated that $1,868,000,000 of revenue would be raised. At that time the Secretary of the Treasury's demand for revenue from taxes was only $1,800,000,000. The House bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee was expected to raise approximately $1,650,000,000. Then came new demands from the Treasury Department. So the bill was referred back to the committee and was reported with amendments which would bring the total amount it would raise up to $2,000,000,000, and the bill as finally passed by the Senate is expected to raise $2,406,670,000.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that it will require $19,005,583,107 to care for the expenditures of the Government and the loans to our allies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that, after deducting the amount to be loaned to our allies, $7,000,000,000, the postal and other receipts that are to be turned back into the Treasury, $11,782,371,000 will be required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

The revenue laws now on the statute books will raise an amount estimated at $1,333,500,000. Adding that to the amount estimated to be raised by the new revenue bill, $2,406,670,000, we have a total of $3,740,170,000. Deducting this latter amount from the estimated needs, $11,782,371,000, we have $8,042,201,000 to be raised from sources other than the taxes now provided.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the careful, prudent business man must reach the conclusion that the revenue bill fails to raise the revenue necessary in this hour of peril. A few days ago the Speaker of this House made a forceful presentation of something like the half-and-half plan, viz, 50 per cent by taxes and 50 per cent by bonds, exclusive of the bonds covering the loans to our allies. To this plan I give my hearty approval.

The facts he presented have not been disputed; his arguments remain unanswered. If this plan should be adopted, the taxes provided for in the revenue bill should be increased to the extent of about $2,000,000,000.

The estimated profits of corporations in this country are more than $4,000,000,000 in excess of their normal profits. It is estimated that the tax on these excess profits amounts to a little less than 32 per cent. Great Britain takes 80 per cent of the excess profits. If we levied 60 per cent, we would increase the receipts provided by the bill $2,400,000,000.

Likewise an additional levy could be made on excessive incomes without producing any real sacrifice. If England can raise $947,700,000 from incomes alone, with a population of 46,000,000 people, we could easily raise double that amount from incomes without disturbing business in any way.

If we levied the British rates of taxation on incomes, we could from that source alone raise $2,000,000,000. It will readily be seen that if we would increase the revenue from incomes $1,000,000,000 and the revenue from excess profits $2,000,000,000 our revenues under existing law and the pending revenue bill would be approximately six and one-half billion dollars, which would take care of the half-and-half plan.

In my judgment the Senate has greatly improved the revenue bill by eliminating the tax on cocoa, coffee, tea, and sugar. The common necessities of life ought not to bear heavy burdens of taxation when the burden can be shifted on those making unheard-of profits because of the war.

Under the estimates given by the Secretary of the Treasury we will at the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, have a bonded and certificate indebtedness amounting to over $15,000,000,000, including our loans to the allies. But these estimates are evidently too low. It will probably reach $17,000,000,000.

If the present rate of speed in making appropriations and in making loans to our allies is maintained for three or four years, we will find the Nation badly crippled financially, unless we increase the tax levies. The time may soon come when we will be compelled to sell our bonds at a discount or to pay excessive interest rates.

Business is now good, immense war profits have accumulated in the past three years and will continue to accrue as long as the war lasts. The time to levy the taxes is now while these war profits are being reaped. In doing so we will conserve our resources against the evil day that may follow. Wisdom would suggest that we avoid the pitfalls, the dangers of inflation, the dangers of debt, by increasing the tax levies. Everyone knows that money is the motive power in the lawsuit, in the business world, and in the battles upon land and sea, while debts and insolvency bring defeat and ruin.

The continued bond issues will increase interest rates, while the bond dealers will hammer the bonds below par. During the Civil War bonds reached the low level of 41.49 cents on the dollar. We paid the debt in full. The interest charges and the depreciation penalized the Government as much as three times the amount received for the bonds. Our liberty bonds are now slightly under par and many of the Government bonds are now selling on the market for less than par. During these trying times we ought to guard zealously the financial resources and credit of the Government.

The Congress recognized the necessity of having an efficient Army and did not hesitate to say to the youth of the land, "We need you to fight the Nation's battles." The mother's tears, the happiness of the homes, love's companionships were all pushed aside because of the Nation's needs in an hour of peril.

We need money to carry on the war until an honorable peace can be secured. There is but one place to go for it, and that is to those who have it. The drafted boy may be a farmer, a laborer, a lawyer, a doctor, or business man, with an earning capacity of $2,000 or more per year. Yet he must give up his income, his business, and his home. He must assume all the perils of the battle fields and all the horrors that await him in the slaughter trenches of Europe. If he should be so fortunate as to return, he will be without money, without practice, without business, and must commence all over again.

In this hour of peril money is just as necessary as men in our supreme effort to win the war. We find the taxpayers pursuing a lucrative business, making immense profits out of the war, and living in fine homes in safe places. The same powers that took the boy from the home now asks the taxpayer to give up only a portion of his excess profits. He should be asked to contribute a far greater amount, for, compared with the sacrifice of the conscripted man, his sacrifice is inconsiderable. Some must fight and some must pay, so men and money must be impressed for service together. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been used in debate on either side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has used 3 hours and 10 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] 1 hour and 50 minutes, so that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has used 1 hour and 20 minutes more time than has been used by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for a few minutes' time just to call attention to some things in the revenue bill as it passed the Senate and is now before the conference committee which it seems to me are unwise and ought to be changed. I mean that the conferees ought to stand for the House provisions and not the Senate provisions.

I want to call attention chiefly to the changes in the administrative features of the income tax. After having had an income tax four years, ever since the first bill was passed, October 3, 1913, with certain administrative features, it seems to me it is very unwise, when we are greatly increasing the taxes, to change the administrative features so as to mix the thing all up.

In the latter part of the bill, beginning on page 102, you will find a great many changes in the administrative features. One of the most notable changes is the fact that in making up your net income returns you are not allowed to deduct the income tax paid to the National Government. Just as a striking illustration and not because it makes any serious difference to any of us, take our own salaries. I mention this partly also because the people at large in the country do not seem to know that we have taxed our salaries. They seem to think that Congress has been canny enough, or something of that sort, to exempt the salaries of its own Members, as we have exempted the salary of the President. This year the Government is taking from our salaries, if we are married, $70, deducted at the source. We never shall see that $70. We do not get it. It is not income to us at all, and it certainly is not "net" income. This bill as it passed the Senate requires us to include that $70 that we never had in our net incomes, on which we are to pay a tax next year. I think that is about as unjust as anything can be. Of course it is exactly the same thing in principle whether we receive the money and pay it back to the Government or whether it is deducted and we do not get it at all.

It seems to me there is no excuse for that sort of thing. If I am correctly informed most other countries allow a deduction of income taxes paid. Taxes paid to States and municipalities are still allowed as a deduction in the Senate bill in making up net income, and I can see no reason why Federal taxes should not also be deducted. Local taxes vary greatly, according to local conditions. In some places they are only 1 per cent, in other places 2 per cent, and in some places 3 per cent. The Federal Government has no control over them. The first income-tax law we passed October 3, 1913, as a part of the revenue bill of that year, provided that benefits assessed, such as the cost of paving, sidewalks, and so forth, are not to be a deduction, and that provision still stands. But some cities to not assess benefits, but include them in the tax rate. Where that is done they are deducted. So that great inequalities are inevitable in allowing the deduction of local taxes, though the local taxes paid, and all taxes paid ought to be deducted, I think, in making up a return of net income.

It seems to me as almost axiomatic, almost beyond the possibility of argument, that taxes paid to the Federal Government itself ought to be deducted. Now, the excuse that has been made at the other end of the Capitol for this change in the present law is that if you allow the deduction of the tax paid there will be somewhat less revenue next year at the given rates, but that seems to me unworthy of consideration. There is a scientific way to fix rates so that the revenues may be constant or increased as desired up to the point of safety to the business of the country. The rates should be raised a little the second year. The deduction of the tax paid will, to a certain extent, prevent the "conscription of incomes," taking 50, 60 or 80 per cent, but such confiscatory rates ought not to be made and can not be made without destroying the sources of revenue. Very large incomes are generally not regular annual incomes from investments, but are individual profits from taking great risks in new enterprises or from speculation. To increase so enormously the rates of taxation will make impossible the taking of the risks and will destroy the incomes and check the business of the country. So far as incomes such as our congressional salaries of $7,500 are concerned, I think they might well be taxed at a higher rate than in either the House or the Senate bill, and I say this though I have very little income beyond my salary. This year $70 is taken from our salaries in income taxes. Next year, if the rates now fixed in the bill are adopted, the amount of tax will be $135 in the case of married men. I think the rate might well be high enough to take $500 from our salary. But whatever it does take, it seems to me that we should be allowed to deduct, in making our returns of net income, in all fairness and justice, and no income-tax payer, no matter how large or how small his tax, should be compelled to return as "net income" any sum he has paid to the Government in taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am entirely in sympathy with the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] as to the necessity for this war, but I do not intend to engage in any discussion as to that.

My desire is to use the few minutes allotted to me in calling attention to the fact that under the manipulation of some of the departments of the Government more of the burdens of this war are to be laid upon certain sections of our people coming from the Southland country than they are entitled to bear. In other words, as the testimony shows on page 765 of the hearings on this bill, there is a statement made by the officer there testifying before the committee that the powder is being bought for 10 cents a pound cheaper than it can be manufactured by the Government in its arsenals.

It is said that it is being bought for 10 per cent less, and perhaps more than that, cheaper than it has been sold to our allies abroad. That sounds very patriotic from the standpoint of Mr. Du Pont, who is furnishing the powder, but when we come to look into it we find this situation: Mr. Du Pont has contracted with what is known as the members of the Cottonseed Oil Trust in the South, who control 45 per cent of the seed, and of the linters that go into the manufacture of explosives, to buy their entire output at $12.50 a bale less than he paid for it last year; that is, reducing it from an average of 7½ cents to 5 cents. Having made that arrangement, he secured 50 per cent of the necessary material for manufacture of these explosives for the Government. The independent companies are all at sea, because they do not know what they can do. They come up here in a panic to get next to Mr. Du Pont's men, and then many of them sell out at $12.50 a bale on their output cheaper than they were paid last year.

The Government, according to the testimony here, is saving about $30,000,000 on its 10 cents a pound deduction for explosives, and after they have made this arrangement the cottonseed crushers yesterday reduced the price of cotton seed $11 a ton all over the country. They say the Government has interfered with the price in the market and proposes to regulate the price, and all over the South, as I gather from telegrams that have come in, the price of the cotton seed has been reduced $11 a ton.

Let us look a minute to see how much, to save the Government the $30,000,000 on explosives, they have taken out of the hide of the southern farmer. You will find that it will cost the southern farmer $61,875,000 to reduce the price of explosives to the Government $30,000,000. That is a pretty good slice of profit. They say the Government has reduced this. The Government has gone into the regulation of matters, and therefore they reduce it. That is the excuse they have given. I went up to see Mr. Hoover, who is supposed to be the general administrator of all matters pertaining to food products, because I want to call attention to the fact that an acre of land that produces a bale of cotton in the United States produces more foodstuffs outside of the cotton than an acre of land producing 40 bushels of corn. If you will figure the units of nourishment gotten from the oil and the meal produced you will find that that is a fact. I went up to see Mr. Hoover, and Mr. Hoover said no, they had not regulated the price of cotton seed and did not intend to, but he said that they had told the manufacturers that they are going to squeeze the speculative profits out of the business. That is what they are doing. They have done and they have not done. They have done that which has furnished the excuse for the manufacturers of cottonseed products to arbitrarily take away from the southern planter, who has borne the brunt—because he lost one crop of cotton since this war began, having to sell it at 6 cents when it cost 12 cents to make; they have absolutely taken away from him at one stroke $60,000,000, because, forsooth, the administrator of food says he has not the power to regulate the price of cotton seed, but he is going to take out the speculative profit and let the consumer have the stuff at what it cost the producer plus a reasonable profit.

You can not hold up that kind of a stick over the manufacturers and not have them unload upon the man who produces, and by that one method our great governmental department has hit the poorest people in this country, the tenant cropper, who is obliged to sell his cotton seed and cotton on the market. If that is going to be the result of our food regulation it is going to take bread out of the mouth of the man who needs it and furnish the manufacturer a stick with which to hammer down the raw product from the producer below what it is worth. Not only that, but in the course of the proceedings the Government has in the last few days made insinuations that there will be an embargo placed upon the exporting of cotton. There is less cotton than the manufacturing world will need, as I shall show before I get through. What has been the result? In 30 days they have reduced the price of cotton $30 a bale. Let us see what these two items, which are only in process of anticipation—not actually in force—is costing the cotton farmer of the South. A reduction of $30 a bale on the 12,500,000 bales that the Agricultural Department estimates will be made this year in the South amounts to $375,000,000, and a reduction, which was put into effect yesterday, of $11 a ton on cotton seed makes a reduction of $61,875,000, which makes a grand total of $436,875,000 that the threatened action of our Government is taking out of the pockets of the farmers of the South; and yet we are expected to pay taxes heavily in the maintenance of this war, and we expect to do it. Let us see where that is going. Who is getting it? There has been no reduction yet.

The cotton manufacturers all over this country are boasting that they have sold their product for months ahead, and they have sold it largely to the Government on the basis of 30-cent cotton, and they are buying their cotton to-day at 20 cents and are expecting to put it down to 18 cents. That is where it is going, and the Government is not getting any consideration for it. The product is being sold to the Government on the basis of 30-cent cotton (and in many instances 35), and they are buying it at 20 cents. I submit that we are getting a rather raw deal on that proposition. Where is the other going? As I said a moment ago, Mr. Du Pont for his patriotism, and the seed crushers of the country, are taking $61,000,000 out of the farmer in order to give the Government a concession of $30,000,000, and the other $30,000,000 is to be profits, I take it, to the seed crushers and Mr. Du Pont. While I do not want to talk local troubles, and all that kind of thing, it strikes me that the activities that are denied, because they publish in the newspapers that there is no necessity for this talk about an embargo upon cotton affecting the price of cotton, are costing the farmers of the South a pretty penny.

The mischief has been done, while there is no embargo to amount to anything. It has been done, and done for the benefit of the people who are already getting money out of this war world without end, and who are now in a position to make more and more if they can hammer down the products of the country. Let us look for a minute to see if there is any necessity for it. I omitted to mention, in addition to the manufacturer, the speculator upon the future markets of this country. The manufacturer and the speculator are the fellows who are going to make $375,000,000 that the farmers will lose if this is consummated. Last year the cotton that was consumed in the world was 20,180,000 bales. The production was 18,365,000 bales. Therefore there was a shortage of more than 1,815,000 bales coming over from last year. This year the estimate is only 12,500,000 bales in this country, and the production will not reach 18,000,000, and yet we find the product that is sold to the Government and that is sold to everybody else on a basis of 30 cents—we find that just the talk of an embargo and the talk of interference with the product and putting it on the skids goes to the extent of reducing the price of cotton $30 a bale for 30 days, or, in other words, it goes down a dollar a bale every day. Where is the necessity for it? There is none, except for the fact that the speculators and the officious intermeddling apparently of somebody is an excuse. Let us see about the oil part of it and the seed cake. The production of seed this year will go to 27,500,000 gallons of oil.

It is an enormous product; it is one of the enormous food products of this country, and they are calling on us to make it; and yet, by officiously saying to the manufacturers "We are going to squeeze you," the manufacturers are going to turn around before they have bought their seed and squeeze the fellow who makes it. Are we to be encouraged that way; are we to be encouraged to make the food products they are crying out for if this is to be taken away from us? Not only that, but the 2,500,000 tons of cottonseed meal. That makes one of the greatest food products, and the excuse that is being offered is that the Government will not allow that to go to Sweden to be fed to cows to be sent to Germany. Well, that is all right. Is that any excuse for saying to them that what it is bringing is more than it is worth, and we are going to squeeze you that much in order to enable us to force so much less for the raw product? Now, I am a supporter of this administration with all my might. I have always stood by Mr. Wilson since the time he was first a candidate, and I stood by him when people were very much against him in my State, and I stand for him to-day; but I say that the method that is being put forth by this officious interference with what they assume in the food department to be a fictitious or exorbitant profit, and thereby give the Executive the power to tax the people who are trying to carry out the dictates of the food-products bill, is an officious and unwarranted interference that is going to be disastrous to the interests of the administration and to the administration of our food bill whenever it becomes known all over the South that our great food bill that we passed here and the powers we have given to Mr. Hoover are to be used for the purpose of hammering down the products that are produced by the people who have at last an opportunity for once in their lives to come out whole and to come out with a profit on the year's transaction. It would be time enough when the crushers had bought the seed at the market price and tried to sell the product at a speculative profit to interfere, and not give them notice beforehand, so that they could take it out of the producer instead of the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks and extend them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHASE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2774. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Gilmer-Pittsburgh Coal Co. to construct a bridge across the Little Kanawha River; referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2796. An act to permit American citizens to wear medals or decorations received from certain foreign countries on entering the military or naval service of the United States, and for other purposes; referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2813. An act to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the Bay and Blakely Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.; referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2816. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Gainesville Red River Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across Red River; referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 15, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of bill to increase the amount of clothing allowance in the case of enlisted men of the Navy on first enlistment (H. #### SENATE.

SATURDAY, September 15, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our times are in Thy hands. Thou dost order our way. We thank Thee that to-day we can look up to the hills from whence cometh our strength and that the Lord God Almighty, the God of hosts, is with us; that the God of Jacob is our refuge. We bless Thee that as we move forward in the midst of the perplexing problems of the day we can move forward with unity of ideals born of the strife of the past but inspired in us by the constant ministry of Thy spirit. Oh, lead us in unity of effort and with a desire to establish a brotherhood of men, and to exalt the name of the God of all men. Bless us this day in the discharge of our duties. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5918) to authorize the President to organize provisionally as Field Artillery or Infantry and to use as Field Artillery or Infantry during the existing emergency such regiments of Cavalry as he may designate, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. FOSTER, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. GARLAND managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) for improving Willapa Harbor and River, Wash., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee on Woman Suffrage, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 130) thereon.

BILL INTRODUCED.

A bill was introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 2887) granting a pension to Mary K. Plowman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

MANUFACTURE OF EXPLOSIVES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. POINDEXTER conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5918. An act to authorize the President to organize provisionally as Field Artillery or Infantry and to use as Field Artillery or Infantry during the existing emergency such regiments of Cavalry as he may designate, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WAR CREDITS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no further routine business, the morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5901, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we might just as well learn at this time whether there is a quorum in the city, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Norris	Sheppard
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Smith, Ariz.
Brandeggee	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Swanson
Curtis	La Follette	Ransdell	Trammell
Fall	Lewis	Robinson	Underwood
Harding	Lodge	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Husting	McNary	Shafroth	Williams

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is absent on official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and say that he is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I will have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GERRY, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. STONE, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is detained on account of illness.

I wish also to announce that the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] is detained by official business at a committee meeting.

Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. KENYON, Mr. STERLING, Mr. KING, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. BORAH, Mr. BROUSSARD, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. WARREN, Mr. NEW, and Mr. GORE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. NEW. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are detained in the Committee on Military Affairs at a hearing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will offer as the first amendment not the one appearing first in the Record, but because of the difficulty we have had in securing a quorum, and as we now have a quorum present, I shall select an amendment which I regard as of sufficient importance to wish to have a quorum pass upon it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. In this connection I should like to announce to the Senate that if we are to complete this bill to-day, it is very important that Senators remain in the Chamber and keep a quorum here, for the reason that there are likely to be record votes called for; and if a quorum can not be had, then we can not go on with the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I call up the amendments not in the order in which they were printed in the Record, but I call up the second amendment because I think it is more important than the others and because upon that amendment I do want a record vote.

Mr. STONE. Which amendment is that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is the amendment which fixes the term within which the bonds may be redeemed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On which page of the bill is the amendment proposed to be inserted?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 3, at the end of line 4, I propose to strike out the period and to insert a colon and the words:

Provided, That such bonds shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years from the date of issue and payable 20 years from such date.

I offer that amendment, which I now send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, at the end of line 4, it is proposed to strike out the period, and to insert a colon and the words:

Provided, That such bonds shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years from the date of issue and payable 20 years from such date.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, so far as I have been able to ascertain, no bonds have been issued in the history of our Government, particularly in a time of war, in the legislation providing for the issue of which Congress did not fix, not only the maximum rate of interest, but also the time within which the bonds might be redeemed and the time within which they must be redeemed. I have been unable to find in all the history of the Government any instance where Congress, if I may use the word, shirked its responsibility on so important a matter as the financing of a war, and handed over to the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion of saying when the obligations incurred under the authority provided should terminate, and the Government pay its bonds.

It will, of course, be said, Mr. President, that this is an extraordinary situation, that the amount of money to be raised is very large, and that it is not easy to anticipate the conditions under which it should be raised at the time the legislation passes Congress.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator give the limit within which the bonds issued during the Civil War were to mature?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall do so in just a few moments.

Mr. President, I was merely saying, preliminary to taking up that question, that it seems to me that in proportion to the magnitude of this undertaking and to the immense responsibility which it carries with it, and to the tremendous influence which it must have in the future of the life of our people, that the obligation is all the more binding upon us to regulate this matter, in so far as we are able to do so.

I do not know that it can be said that in proportion to the wealth of the country and the population of the country at this time that the obligations which we are assuming, so far as legislation before us is concerned, are any larger relatively than the obligations which we assumed in the Civil War. Considering the conditions that confronted the country at that time, I do not believe that the obligations which we are assuming now impose upon Congress any obligation to invest an executive officer with such an extraordinary discretion.

Conditions change, Mr. President. In all of the loans that have been negotiated heretofore it has been a fundamental consideration that the Government should put itself in a position at the time that it makes its loans to avail itself of the conditions, which change invariably regarding interest rates and everything pertaining to the loans. So that the bond owner shall not be able to reap altogether the advantages that come from the changed conditions and the Government may avail itself of the right to call in the loan and, if need be, to renegotiate the loan upon the better terms that prevail at that time.

Loans will always be made, Mr. President, in an emergency upon very favorable terms to those who furnish the money. That is inevitable. The Government wants the money; it does not want to be humiliated by any failure in negotiating the loan, and therefore it makes the conditions attractive to investment and the loan is consummated.

Mr. President, when you pass out from those conditions and come down to 5, 10, 15, or 20 years later, upon an entirely different set of conditions, it has invariably been held by all authorities in Government finance that the Government should be in a position at such time to readjust conditions and make them fair both to the Government and to those who want to carry the loan any longer. That is all this amendment means; it proposes to give the Government the opportunity after a period of a certain number of years, say 5, and not beyond a certain number of years, say 20, to readjust or to pay, as the condition of the Public Treasury and the finances of the country may permit, either to discharge the obligation altogether or to readjust it upon terms that are absolutely fair to both the money lender and the Government at the time.

Consider, Mr. President and Senators, if this were a personal obligation and you were negotiating a loan at a time when money was perhaps rather tight, and you had to make the conditions such that they were very favorable to the investor, if you could do so, it would surely be to your interest as a borrower, and it would surely be just to the lender as well, that at not too remote a period there should be an opportunity to revise the contract and readjust the conditions of the contract between the borrower and the lender. That is all this means.

Mr. President, I beg to say—and I shall be very brief—

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no doubt in my mind that it is a desirable thing that an option be given to the Government, unless it would interfere with the success of the loan. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has made inquiry in regard to what are the more desirable bonds? We have a regular bond market in which bonds varying in length as to the time which they run are sold, and there ought to be some general opinion as to the benefit of time-limit provisions as compared with bonds intended to run a long time. Has the Senator looked into that question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In the first place, Mr. President, we have negotiated a bond issue of $2,000,000,000 at 3½ per cent; and it has been the complaint of the business interests of the country that desired to secure money for carrying forward large enterprises that the competition of the Government upon the terms of that bond issue was such as to preempt the money market and place them at a disadvantage in comparison with the opportunity that the Government offered to investors. It is proposed to make this loan upon a somewhat different basis. While the first loan was nontaxable, this loan is to be partially taxable; but as an offset to that, while the first loan was at 3½ per cent interest this loan is to be at 4 per cent interest.

Mr. President, I take it that while the Secretary of the Treasury, in drafting this bill and fixing the rate of interest at 4 per cent, did not provide for any fixed term within which the bonds might be paid and for an outside limitation of the time at which they would have to be paid, he did go to the extent of saying in the draft which he prepared and submitted to the Ways and Means Committee of the House that the rate of interest should not exceed 4 per cent, and he did prescribe certain regulations with respect to the taxation of the bonds.

As modified by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, it was made more attractive to investors than in the form in which the Secretary of the Treasury presented it. So that it is fair to say that the Secretary of the Treasury blocked out this bond proposition, upon which he proposes to go to the country in a campaign, upon terms more favorable to the Government than the terms presented here. But there was one provision—and it is the limitation which I seek to impose by this amendment—which was omitted from the draft made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I trust that we have not reached such a point in the history of this Government and of congressional action that it is to be regarded as offensive to suggest some modification in a bill which comes to us from the executive department of the Government. Mr. President, in the last three or four years we have drifted away beyond anything ever before known in the history of this Government. Congress has acquired the habit of divesting itself of all responsibility as to legislation, except to put its votes on record in favor of whatever is prepared for it. I think we are dealing with a matter now so supremely important to the people of this country, who will have to shoulder and meet these obligations of indebtedness, surpassing anything in the history of this or of any other Government, that we should not depart from the established precedents and clothe any one mortal with the discretion sought to be conferred by this proposed legislation.

I am saying nothing that ought to be construed as criticism of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I say that this is a matter of stupendous and fundamental importance, and that it belongs, according to all precedent and, as I believe, according to correct reasoning, to the Congress itself, in which alone, by the Constitution, is reposed the power to provide all the means for conducting a war; and, therefore, Congress should also provide the terms upon which the means shall be furnished. If the Secretary of the Treasury, now some weeks ahead of the time when he proposes to offer these bonds upon the market, can foretell, so as to put it into the law, that the rate of interest shall not be above a certain amount, why can not Congress supply that which, as I shall show in a moment, has always been in legislation of this kind, namely, the length of time that the bonds are to run?

Is it any less important to the negotiation of these bonds to fix the time limit within which they may be paid by the Government—as I have proposed in this amendment, not sooner than 5 years and not later than 20 years—is it any less important to the negotiation of these bonds to fix that element before we start the campaign than it is to fix the rate per cent? The rate per cent is fixed in the draft of the bill, as prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, within these wide limits; and if they are not wide enough, it is within the province of Congress to say that it shall be at a more extended period than 20 years. I have named 5 and 20 because it seems to me that the obligations of this war ought to be taken care of much more largely by taxation than they have been; but, as to the bond issue, that we ought not to postpone that indefinitely, as we do by the terms of this bill.

You may have a bond issued by the Secretary of the Treasury payable 40 years hence under the terms of this bill, or, for that matter 80 years hence. You have taken your hands off, if you pass the bill as it is drawn, and clothed him with the power to make the time limit just as extended as he pleases.

I undertake to say that when we were discussing the first bond authorization here there was no suggestion made by anybody that those bonds would be issued for as long a period of time as 30 years; and yet, as I understand, they were. They can not be redeemed for 15 years. Do you understand, Senators, what those bonds, nontaxable, issued at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, mean to a man who has a million dollars of income and takes advantage of escaping taxation upon that income by investing his money in those bonds? It means  $9\frac{1}{2}$  per cent interest to him on those bonds.

Was it necessary, Mr. President, to tie the hands of this Government so that it could not change that contract for a period of 15 years, as has been done? Not one of those bonds—in which Rockefeller has invested, I think, some \$15,000,000, and upon which he is going to realize  $9\frac{1}{2}$  per cent—can be paid for a period of 15 years, and the Government has got to pay that interest. Who has got to pay it? I said the Government has got to pay it. All the people have got to pay it, Mr. President. The interest is going to be paid right along at  $9\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on an investment like that, with the Government back of it. It is going to be paid, Mr. President, to Mr. Rockefeller at  $9\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, by all the people, by the levying of consumption taxes when this war is over; and the men who have done the fighting will have to shoulder their part of it by the higher prices that they pay for the things they eat and wear and use.

Mr. President, just take that first bond issue as an example of what this looseness of legislation means. I do not believe there was a Member of this body at the time that first bond issue was authorized who knew that that was what it meant. I know that I try to do my work as diligently as I can, as I am sure other Members do, and I did not know it. You remember that the bill providing for that bond issue came here and was passed in just a few hours, and we enacted legislation which permitted the negotiation of the  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent bonds that were sold as liberty bonds, as nontaxable, and at a period for first payment and ultimate payment to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and he exercised the discretion that Congress had given him, and made the bond issue not payable for 15 years, or until 1932. You can not touch it until that time; and yet it became common knowledge a few weeks after the terms had been fixed that the men of large incomes who invested their money there would make  $9\frac{1}{2}$  per cent!

I will undertake to say that if Congress had understood that, if the Senate had understood that, I do not believe they would have permitted that bond issue to have been made in that way; and, Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that the Secretary himself did not understand it. I am not sure about that; but the fact that he comes back here now and proposes a 4 per cent bond issue, with some taxation imposed upon the money invested, shows that he at least is willing to change somewhat the conditions as to the interest charges and the taxes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to take too much time, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should just like to call the attention of the Senator to the statement made by Mr. McAdoo in his testimony before the House committee, and ask the Senator's views upon that statement, in which Mr. McAdoo goes a little into this question and suggests that he contemplates issuing bonds which will end at different periods. I will read it, if the Senator please.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, I am familiar with it, Mr. President. I will ask the Senator not to read it now. What I object to is Congress divesting itself of the responsibility that rests upon Congress of fixing the term itself, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that never before has such a thing been done.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. This has occurred to me as a possible reason for giving such discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury; namely, the possible necessities and abilities of our allies. I suppose, of course, that out of the proceeds of these bonds the bonds of the allied governments will be purchased, and the question is as to whether or not we could very well limit the time after which these bonds may be redeemed, and the time at which they may be payable, on that account. I wondered whether or not the Senator had considered that question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this Government is empowered to take the obligations of foreign governments, and it is taking the obligations of foreign governments, expressed in very general terms. I will say that. I can say that much. The Secretary of the Treasury went into it somewhat fully before the committee, and his testimony upon that point was not taken down; but it is expected that from time to time whatever securities the foreign governments furnish for the time being may be exchanged so as to meet the changing conditions. It is to be remembered, Mr. President, that we are only contemplating here negotiating four billions of bonds. We are not in any sense meeting the obligations that rest upon us, so far as appropriations and expenditures are concerned, by this bill. I hope that is already in the minds of Senators here. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], in presenting the bill, spent considerable time in making deductions from which it could be shown that in proportion to the amount of money raised by taxation and the amount of money to be raised by bonds, the rates were 45 and 55 per cent, respectively. You can make any sort of percentages in that way if you just take a portion of the obligations that you have to meet and offset against it a portion of the taxes that are to be raised.

The calculation made left out of consideration altogether the great appropriation that is covered by the bill that is now on the way over to us and that must be passed before we adjourn, appropriating as it will before it is passed between four and five billions of money. That is not covered at all, or provided for at all, here.

Mr. President, we are not foreclosing ourselves against changing these conditions in a subsequent bond issue that we may be called upon to authorize when we meet in December, and we will be called upon either to authorize a subsequent bond issue to take care of the deficiencies that are not covered at all here by the provisions of this bill, or else, as I hope, to impose higher taxation upon war profits and surplus incomes instead of making a bond issue. But if we are driven by the majority to a bond issue, we can at that time impose other conditions. It is only three or four months away, and it is not expected by the Secretary of the Treasury, as he testified before the committee, that he will be able to prosecute more than the campaign contemplated by this bill for four billions; that is, I mean, of course, for four billions of new issue. The other three billions and some hundred millions are to take up bonds that are already provided for, but not yet issued. So that, Mr. President, at any time when a bond issue is contemplated we, the Senate and the House of Representatives, can make any change in the conditions that are important to be made at the time just as well as the Secretary can.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to call attention briefly to some of the things we have done in the past.

In the Spanish-American War loan, by the act approved June 13, 1898, it was provided:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time, as the proceeds may be required to defray expenditures authorized on account of the existing war (such proceeds when received to be used only for the purpose of meeting such war expenditures), the sum of $400,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe and in denominations of $20 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after 10 years from the date of their issue and payable 20 years from such date, and bearing interest payable quarterly in coin at the rate of 3 per cent per annum.

That is the provision under which we negotiated the bonds necessary to enable us to carry on the Spanish-American War.

The same provision is found in the Panama Canal bonds. I pass that because that was a bond issue in time of peace.

I go back now to the war immediately preceding the Spanish-American War.

By the act of March 2, 1861, the President was authorized to borrow not to exceed $10,000,000. The act contained a prohibition against any stipulation or contract to prevent the United States from reimbursing any sum borrowed under the act after the expiration of 10 years, and provided that no contract should be made to prevent the redemption of the same after the expiration of 20 years from July 1, 1861.

Mr. President, I beg to remind Senators that when these loans were provided for the whole future of this Government was threatened. We were in the midst of a civil war at that time; and yet, as hard a strain as that condition put upon Government credit, at no time during those dark days did this Government ever consider authorizing the borrowing of money and leaving to the discretion of a single executive officer the terms and the limitations of the obligation that was to be incurred.

Every time the Congress of the United States fixed the interest rate, fixed the period for which the loan was to run, and held its guiding hand upon the financing of the great sums—and they were great sums at that time—necessary to carry on the war for the preservation of the Union.

Under the act of July 17, 1861, the President was authorized to borrow $250,000,000 and to issue coupon and registered bonds or Treasury notes in such proportions as he might deem advisable, the interest on the bonds not to exceed 7 per cent annually, payable semiannually, irredeemable for 20 years, and after that period redeemable at the pleasure of the United States. I am going to call your attention in just a moment to the very sound opinion of John Sherman—one of the greatest financiers, I think, that this Government has produced in all its history—commending this course.

I pass now to the third issue.

Under the act of March 3, 1863, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to borrow $300,000,000 for the current fiscal year and $600,000,000 for the next fiscal year, and to issue bonds in denominations of not less than $50 and at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent, and to dispose of such bonds upon such terms as he might deem most advisable for lawful money of the United States, or for any of the certificates of indebtedness or deposits that might at any time be unpaid, or for Treasury notes thereafter issued, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the Government after such period as might be fixed by the Secretary, not less, however, than 10 years nor more than 40 years from date. I undertake to say that you can not find a precedent for what Congress has been doing or what Congress proposes to do in this legislation.

Under the act of March 3, 1864, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to borrow not exceeding $200,000,000 and to issue bonds for same "redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after any period not less than five years and payable at any period not more than 40 years from date, * * * bearing interest not exceeding 6 per cent a year."

Under the act of June 30, 1864, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to borrow $400,000,000, to issue bonds of the United States "redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after any period not less than 5 nor more than 30 years, or if deemed expedient made redeemable at a period not more than 40 years from date, * * * and bear annual interest not exceeding 6 per cent."

This act also authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue in lieu of these bonds not exceeding $200,000,000 of Treasury notes, payable at any time not exceeding three years, and bearing interest at 7½ per cent, payable in lawful money.

The act of March 3, 1865, authorized the Secretary to borrow not to exceed $600,000,000 and to issue bonds or Treasury notes, the bonds payable at any period not more than 40 years from date of issue, or redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at or after any period not less than 5 years nor more than 40 years from date. The bonds were to issue at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent, payable in coin.

Mr. President, John Sherman, of Ohio, spoke in the Senate on May 22, 1866, upon the bill to reduce the interest on the national debt and funding the same. Now, mark you, this occurred in 1866, as soon as the war was over. The Civil War, down to that time the greatest in history, had put a heavy strain upon the finances of the world. A great war makes a drain not only upon the finances of the country involved, but is a tax more or less, through disturbance of business and through readjustment, upon the finances of the world. Yet, Mr. President, one year after the war conditions changed, the interest rate dropped, and the Government, through the wisdom and foresight of the statesmen of that war period, was in a position to avail itself of those changed conditions.

Mark you, Mr. President, that is a point not to be lost sight of. When the money is borrowed it must be borrowed upon the terms of the lender. Even the Government must pay at such a time whatever it pleases the lender to demand. Otherwise the money will not be loaned. So Congress or any other governmental authority in fixing the terms upon which the money is to be borrowed in war time will make the terms liberal enough to insure the securing of the loan. The Government can not afford to fail in negotiating the loan, and that imposes a greater obligation upon those charged with the responsibility of authorizing the loan, since the loan must be negotiated under conditions which enable the lender to very nearly fix the terms, to see that there shall be in that contract the opportunity for the Government, after the crisis shall have passed and when the Government should have in fairness to the people, who must pay, an opportunity to readjust on terms that are fair to the lender and to the borrower, and that the conditions of the contract shall be such that the readjustment can be made.

So you see here we have the striking precedent and example of this Government in 1866, one year after the Civil War closed, availing itself of the important provision, which had been enacted during the war, for a readjustment of interest rates, so that the people were not obliged to go on paying the high interest rates; so that they might discharge any part of the principal that they were able to pay and stop the interest altogether or as to any amount of the principal which they were not prepared to discharge; that they might readjust interest rates.

John Sherman, speaking in the Senate May 22, 1866, upon a bill to reduce the rates of interest on the national debt and funding same, said:

I do not arraign the policy that was adopted during the war of making short loans. It was proper to do it; it was necessary to do it. It is not proper for this Government to stipulate to pay these high rates of interest for a long period of time.

Remember, Senators, that in peace we negotiated the Panama Canal bonds at 3 per cent, and I am not sure but that at a lower rate than that; but certainly not higher than 3 per cent. When this world shall have happily found peace and interest rates go down, let us not now by any remissness on our part make it possible for the high interest rates that are being fixed in this legislation—4 per cent, only partially taxable—being continued for an indefinite period. Before it leaves our control let us not leave it without having written into the legislation that which will give us a chance to revise the conditions.

Continuing, Senator Sherman said:

It is not proper for this Government to stipulate to pay these high rates of interest for a long period of time, and therefore during the war it was necessary to make short loans at a high rate of interest, but it was always done in view of reducing the rate of interest after the war was over, and with a view of consolidating the whole debt. The policy, so far as I know, of those connected with the finances of the country has been to keep ever in view the principle of redeemableness in every form of security issued during the war. Therefore the five-twenty bond was payable or might be paid after five years. The seven-thirties and the various forms of securities that have been issued are within the reach of the Government in a short time.

So, Mr. President, we have not only the precedent of legislation, but we have the admonitions of one of the wisest statesmen, one of the most eminent financiers, this country ever produced. I think if my time had permitted I could have collected volumes of like authority upon this subject.

The quotation I have just read was May 22, 1866. I read another short quotation from Senator Sherman. Speaking on the funding bill February 27, 1868, Senator Sherman said:

There is another way in which I suppose we might negotiate a bond at a low rate of interest, and that is by postponing the payment of the principal to an indefinite period—

As far as Congress is concerned, that is what we are doing here. According to the authority, there is a class of Government obligations that are called indefinite, they are so remote in the period of time fixed for their redemption, and Senator SHERMAN said:

There is another way in which I suppose we might negotiate a bond at a low rate of interest; and that is by postponing the payment of the principal to an indefinite period. That, however, is against the American notions of finance. Our people have always looked upon a debt as a burden to be paid off as rapidly as possible, and public opinion and good policy would not tolerate the making of a very long loan; and I for one would not, under any circumstances, vote for one which it would not be within the power of the Government to redeem within 20 years.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was called from the Chamber, and I did not hear the opening remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin. I am very deeply interested in the phase of the subject he is now discussing. Was the subject in the committee considered; and if so, if it is not revealing the secrets of the committee, what is the reason assigned for not placing a limitation upon the time issue of the bonds?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I brought the matter to the attention of the committee and reserved the right to present upon the floor precisely the amendments which I have offered. At the same time I made inquiry of the members of the committee who are much older in service upon the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate than I am. My position upon that committee, because of my more recent appointment upon the committee, is at the foot of the table. I asked the older members of the committee if they could advise me as to whether there had ever been legislation of this sort passed by Congress in which the conditions of the bond as to payment, as to time of payment, and all the other conditions were not fixed by Congress itself. Nobody about the committee was able to advise me, and I reserved the right to offer such amendments on the floor after I should have time to look the matter up.

I will say to the junior Senator from Utah that the bill was before the committee, considering its magnitude, but a very brief period of time. We disposed of it in two days, with partial sittings, with the Senate in session at the same time. To sum it up, I did not have time to go into that matter at all, and I am placing before the Senate the information which I would have placed before the committee had I, from the time I received the first notice that the meeting of the committee for the consideration of the bill, had a chance to examine all the acts to which I am now calling the attention of the Senate. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. STERLING. Before the Senator from Wisconsin passes on I should like to ask him if our financial history discloses any hesitation or delay in taking such bonds as he speaks of, bonds running for a short period, the five-twenties, for example? Was there hesitation and delay in negotiating the sale or the taking of the bonds by the public because of the short period?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have found no reference to anything of the kind in any of the financial works that cover the period in a historical way which I have examined.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit an interruption, I suggest, in answer to the query of the Senator from South Dakota, that I noted the acts while the Senator was reading. I think nearly all, if not all, the later acts provided for a five-year period in which the bonds would run.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think there is the answer to the Senator's interrogatory.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that is a complete answer to the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A time-limit contract would not have been repeated as it was in the later issue legislation if there had been any difficulty whatever in negotiating the bonds.

Mr. STERLING. I will simply say I never heard any objection or any delay in negotiating those bonds because of the short time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not found any.

Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate or the time of the Senators who are present to read the issue of bonds in the other years which I have collected here. I will just ask leave to make such extracts from these accounts of that legislation as I have gathered and to incorporate it without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

The act of May 7, 1800 (6th Cong., 1st sess., ch. 42), provides:

"That the President of the United States shall be, and hereby is, authorized to borrow on behalf of the United States, from the banks of the United States, which is hereby authorized to lend the same, or from any other body or bodies politic or corporate, or from any person or persons, and upon such terms and conditions as he shall judge most advantageous for the United States, a sum not exceeding $3,500,000 in addition to the moneys to be received into the Treasury of the United States from taxes, for making up any deficiency in any appropriation heretofore made by law, or to be made during the present session of Congress, and defraying the expenses which may be incurred by calling into actual service any part of the militia of the United States, or by raising, equipping, and calling into actual service any regular troops or volunteers, pursuant to authorities vested or to be vested in the President of the United States by law: Provided, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums borrowed at any time after the expiration of 15 years from the date of such loan."

The act of May 2, 1811 (11th Cong., 3d sess., ch. 32), provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, empowered to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $5,000,000 at a rate of interest, payable quarterly yearly, not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, and reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States or at such periods as may be stipulated by contract, not exceeding six years from the 1st day of January next, to be applied in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury or which may be received therein from other sources during the present year to defray any of the public expenses which are or may be authorized by law."

The act of March 14, 1812 (12th Cong., 1st sess., ch. 41), provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States a sum not exceeding $11,000,000, at an interest not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, payable quarterly yearly, to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury or which may be received from other sources, to defray any of the expenses which have been or may during the present session of Congress be authorized by law and for which appropriations have been or may during the present session of Congress be made by law: Provided, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed at any time after the expiration of 12 years from the 1st day of January next."

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constituted certificates of stock signed by the Register of the Treasury or by a commissioner of loans for the sum to be borrowed by virtue of this act, or for any part thereof, bearing an interest of 6 per cent and reimbursable as aforesaid," etc.

The act of February 8, 1813 (12th Cong., 2d sess., ch. 21), provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States a sum not exceeding $16,000,000, to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury or which may be received from other sources, to defray any of the expenses which have been or during the present session of Congress may be authorized by law and for which appropriations have been or during the present session of Congress may be made by law: Provided, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed at any time after the expiration of 12 years from the 1st day of January next."

"That the President of the United States do cause to be laid before Congress on the first Monday in February, 1814, or as soon thereafter as Congress may be in session, an account of all the moneys obtained by the sale of the certificates of stock by virtue of the power given him by the preceding section, together with a statement of the rate at which the same may have been sold."

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ, with the approbation of the President of the United States, an agent or agents for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions to the loan authorized by this act or of selling any part of the stock created by virtue thereof. A commission not exceeding one-quarter of 1 per cent on the amount thus sold or for which subscriptions shall have been thus obtained may be by the Secretary of the Treasury be allowed to such agent or agents; and a sum not exceeding $40,000, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated for paying the amount of such commission or commissions as may be thus allowed and also for defraying the expenses of printing and issuing the subscription certificates and certificates of stock and other expenses incident to the receiving of subscriptions and completing the loan authorized by this act," etc.

The act of August 2, 1813 (13th Cong., 1st sess., ch. 51), provides: "That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $7,500,000, to be applied in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury or which may be received from other sources, to defray any expenses which have been or which may be authorized for the service of the years 1813 and 1814 and for which appropriations have been or may be made by law during those years: Provided, That no engagement or contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed at any time after the expiration of 12 years from the 1st day of January next."

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constituted certificates of stock, signed by the Register of the Treasury or by a commissioner of loans, for the sum to be borrowed by this act or for any part thereof, and the same to be sold: Provided, That no such certificate shall be sold at a rate less than 88 per cent, or $88 in money for $100 in stock. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be laid before Congress, on the first Monday in February, 1814, or as soon thereafter as Congress may be in session, an account of all the moneys obtained by the sale of the certificates of stock in manner aforesaid, together with a statement of the rate at which the same may have been sold," etc.

The act of July 22, 1846 (29th Cong., 1st sess., ch. 64), provides:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the Government may require; and, in place of such of the same as may be redeemed, to cause others to be issued; but not exceeding the sum of $10,000,000 of this emission outstanding at any one time, and to be issued under the limitations and other provisions contained in the act entitled 'An act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes,' approved the 12th of October, 1837, except that the authority hereby given to issue Treasury notes shall expire at the end of one year from the passage of this act."

"That the President, if in his opinion it shall be the interest of the United States to do so, instead of issuing the whole amount of Treasury notes authorized by the first section of this act, may borrow on the credit of the United States such an amount of money as he may deem proper, and issue therefor stock of the United States for the sum thus borrowed, in the same form, and under the same restrictions, limitations, and provisions, as are contained in the act of Congress, approved April 15, 1842."

"Provided, however, That the sum so borrowed, together with the Treasury notes issued by virtue of this act, shall not in the whole exceed the sum of $10,000,000; And provided further, That no commission shall be allowed or paid for the negotiation of the loan authorized by this act; and also that the said stock shall be redeemable at a period not longer than 10 years from the issue thereof."

"That the Treasury notes and the stock issued under the provisions of this act shall not bear a higher rate of interest than 6 per cent per annum, and no part thereof shall be disposed of at less than par."

The act of January 28, 1847 (29th Cong., 2d sess., ch. 5), provides:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes, for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the Government may require, but not exceeding in the whole amount of notes issued the sum of $23,000,000, and of denominations not less than $50 for any one note, to be prepared, signed, and issued in the manner hereinafter provided."

"That the said Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the first section of this act shall be reimbursed and redeemed by the United States, at the Treasury thereof, after the expiration of one year or two years from the dates of the said notes, respectively; from which said dates they shall bear such interest until they shall be respectively redeemed, as shall be expressed upon the face of the said notes, which rate of interest upon each several issue of the said notes shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and approbation of the President, but shall in no case exceed the rate of interest of 6 per cent per annum," etc.

The act of March 31, 1848 (30th Cong., 1st sess., ch. 26), provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, at any time within one year from the passage of this act, to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $16,000,000, or so much thereof as in his opinion the exigencies of the Government may require, at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, payable quarterly or semiannually, which loan shall be made reimbursable at any time after 20 years from the 1st day of July next after the passage of this act."

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, with the consent of the President of the United States, to cause to be prepared certificates of stock. Provided, That no part of said stock be sold below par."

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive proposals for the taking of such loan, or any part or parts thereof; and that before disposing of the said stock issued for such loan the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be inserted in one or two public newspapers printed in the city of Washington and in one or two public newspapers printed in the principal city or capital of each State an advertisement stating that bids and proposals for such loan will be received until a certain day, to be specified in such advertisement, not more than 60 days or less than 20 days from the time of the first insertion of said advertisement in one or two newspapers in the city of Washington, and stating the amount of the loan required, and in what installments, and when and where it will be required to be paid," etc.

The act of June 22, 1860 (36th Cong., 1st sess., ch. 180), provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized, at any time within 12 months from the passage of this act, to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $21,000,000, or so much thereof as, in his opinion, the exigencies of the public service may require. * * *

"That stock shall be issued for the amount so borrowed, bearing interest not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, and to be reimbursed within a period not beyond 20 years and not less than 10 years. * * *

Provided, That no certificate shall be issued for a less sum than $1,000. * * *

"That before awarding said loan the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be inserted in two of the public newspapers of the city of Washington, and in one or more public newspapers in other cities of the United States, public notice that sealed proposals for such loan will be received until a certain day, to be specified in such notice, not less than 30 days from its first insertion in a Washington newspaper. * * *

And provided, That no stock shall be disposed of at less than its par value; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for engraving and printing the certificates and other expenses of executing this act," etc.

The act of February 5, 1861 (36th Cong., 2d sess., ch. 25), provides: "That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized, at any time before the 1st day of July next, to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $25,000,000. * * *

"That stock shall be issued for the amount so borrowed, bearing interest not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, and to be reimbursed within a period not beyond 20 years and not less than 10 years. * * *

Provided, That no certificate shall be issued for a less sum than $1,000. * * *

"That before awarding said loan the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be inserted in two of the public newspapers of the city of Washington, and in one or more public newspapers in other cities of the United States. * * *

And the said Secretary shall report to Congress at the commencement of the next session the amount of money borrowed under this act, and of whom and on what terms it shall have been obtained, with an abstract or brief statement of all the proposals submitted for the same, distinguishing between those accepted and those rejected, with a detailed statement of the expense of making such loans," etc.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With that, Mr. President, I leave this matter to the sound consideration of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, when the Senator from Wisconsin asked on yesterday to have the bill go over until to-day, stating in substance that he had several amendments to offer, but expressing the opinion that only a comparatively brief time would be occupied in discussion, I agreed to the request to have the bill go over. I hoped that we would be able to take up the bill this morning and dispose of it without prolonged debate, although I was at the time doubtful about a realization of that hope. However, I still indulge the hope that debate may not be unduly protracted.

The Senator from Wisconsin is a member of the Committee on Finance. This bill came to the Senate from the House on September 7 and was referred on that day to the Senate Finance Committee. It was reported by the Finance Committee to the Senate on September 13. So the bill was here in charge of the Senate for a week before it was reported back by the committee, and Senators had ample opportunity to examine it if they desired to do so.

I regret that the Senator from Wisconsin did not present his amendments to the Committee on Finance while the bill was being considered there. He was present at the committee meetings, as he has stated. The Secretary of the Treasury was present at those meetings for the greater part of two days, as were two other gentlemen connected with the Treasury Department, as I have said heretofore.

The Committee on Finance has had no opportunity to discuss the amendments which the Senator proposed on yesterday; they have not been considered by the committee. I regret that the Senator from Wisconsin did not bring his suggestions, which are now made to the Senate, before the committee in the first instance, that they might have been first considered there. It is true that at the conclusion of the committee hearings the Senator stated that he reserved the right to present amendments in the open Senate; that he did not know at that time what amendments, if any, he would present; but that he reserved the right to present amendments; that is true.

The Senator from Wisconsin says that he asked the committee when in session what were the terms of previous bond issues, and that no one seemed able to give him the information he sought. I accept the Senator's statement that he made that inquiry, although I have no personal remembrance of it; and, even if I had heard the inquiry, I for one could not, on the spur of the moment, have been able to answer the Senator's question any more than the Senator could have answered it for himself. The Senator from Wisconsin is an able and experienced public man; he has served in the two Houses of Congress as long as almost any of us; he is now holding a commission authorizing him to sit in the Senate, a position he adorns with his exceptional abilities, and the matter he desired to know about could have been examined by him as well as by any man, during the week the bill was pending in the Senate and before it was acted on by the Senate committee. No Senator could know better how to find the information he desired, no Senator knows better the avenues through which information can be obtained than does my distinguished friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STONE. I do not wish the Senator from Wisconsin to feel any offense at what I am saying, for I am not indulging, nor is it my purpose to indulge, in captious or offensive criticism of him. I am merely saying that the Senator had the opportunity as complete as that of any other Senator or any member of the committee to secure the information he wanted. He had the same opportunity as others to read the bill, to criticize it, and to submit amendments to it. He could have done that as well as any of his committee colleagues.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will answer the Senator in my own time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator. The Senator can take time now if he desires to do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I do not care to do so.

Mr. STONE. Very well.

Mr. President, as I have stated, the Senator from Wisconsin reserved the right to offer amendments. He submitted none to the committee, but he brings his amendments here and offers them in the open Senate, and it seems the day is to be taken up in debating them. I think he should have given the committee a chance to consider them. There may be merit in some of these amendments; there may not be; but I do think they ought to have been submitted to the Committee on Finance by the Senator, who is a distinguished member of that committee, and who attended the hearings before the committee and had the bill in his hands for days before the committee took it up. So much for that.

Mr. President, the language of the bill as it came from the other House and as it came from the Committee on Finance of the Senate, as to the provision now under discussion, is as follows:

The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form or forms and denomination or denominations and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate or rates of interest, not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and time or times of payment of interest, as the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time at or before the issue thereof may prescribe. The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value.

To that the Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, to come in after what I have read, to this effect:

Provided, That such bonds shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years from the date of issue and payable 20 years from such date.

In other words, to make these bonds five-twenty bonds.

Mr. President, on April 24, 1917, Congress passed a law, which was approved on that date, authorizing the issue of $5,000,000,000 of bonds similar to the bonds authorized in the pending bill and for the same general purposes, which contained this language:

The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate and time of payment of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

That is almost the exact language of the bill before the Senate, and that was passed with practical unanimity by the Senate and by the House.

Mr. President, what the House and the Senate committees have done was to adopt substantially and almost in the same words what we did in the act of April 24 last. Under that act of April 24, and under the authority that act conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury, he issued $2,000,000,000 of the $5,000,000,000 of bonds authorized, making them payable at the pleasure of the Government at any time between 15 and 30 years from date, the Government having the right to exercise the option of paying the bonds at its pleasure during that period, but being obliged to take all of them up at the end of 30 years.

What is the situation confronting us? We are proposing to issue seven and one-half billion dollars of bonds. We all know that the probability is that before the war ends we may have to issue another seven and a half billions, and even more than that. No man can tell to what extent this war may impose financial obligations upon this Government. The Senator from Wisconsin would require the Secretary of the Treasury to put out these seven and a half billion dollars of bonds as five-twenty bonds. Do you think he could do it? Considering the vastness of the proposition, do you think he could do it? Do you not at least think there is a great difficulty confronting the Secretary in this task, even with the authority conferred upon him by the bill to exercise discretion as to the maturity of the bonds?

Remember, these seven and a half billion dollars of bonds must be put out during this fiscal year, of which only nine and a half months remain.

Mr. President, my distinguished friend, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who is especially looking after quorums, advises me sub rosa that I am endangering the presence of a quorum by the talk I am making. I am more anxious to have a vote than I am to make a speech.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I can not have the Senator leave the record as his statement might leave it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STONE. Sure, I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to say that the Senator is not endangering a quorum. His addresses are always informing and illuminating. I only desired to call attention to the fact that this being Saturday afternoon many Senators have come to me and stated that they wanted to get away for certain reasons, and I simply informed the Senator of that fact, feeling that if he did not consider that his address was necessary to the occasion there was that reason why he should not prolong it, not that his address interferes with anything, for he always adds to any subject which he discusses.

Mr. STONE. Not feeling that what I am saying is necessary, I am willing to quit right now and call for a vote. Above all things, I want a vote. Knowing Senate conditions as I do, I thank my friend from Illinois for his timely suggestion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. KING. I submit to the Senator from Missouri that perhaps if he would call for a vote immediately he might have some votes against him that otherwise, because of his illuminating address, might be in favor of the position which he has assumed. I therefore suggest to him, if it meets with his approval, that he continue his very able and very interesting discussion of this question, because, I will say to him now frankly, if he calls for a vote, I shall vote against the committee and for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator has that opinion, but I fear I should not convince him by continuing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Utah how long he thinks it would require for the Senator from Missouri to convince him?

Mr. STONE. I seem not to have made much progress in that direction so far.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to which Senator does he yield?

Mr. STONE. To either of them.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not desire to interfere. I was merely about to make a suggestion, which, however, may not be necessary.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, in what I said there was perhaps some facetiousness; but I do submit in all seriousness to my distinguished friend from Missouri that this is a very important phase of a very important question. That the issue of these bonds is necessary can not be denied; but in view of the past financial history of our country and the fact that there was a limit placed upon the bonds in the acts under which they were authorized, it seems to me that it would have been a wise idea to have limited the life of the bonds, not to 20 years, for I am not in sympathy with that feature of the provision of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, nor am I in sympathy with the five-year limit; but it occurred to me that a limit of ten-thirty or ten-forty would be proper and would be infinitely better than to leave it as it is. Of course, we all have supreme confidence in the present Secretary of the Treasury; no more able man ever filled that position; but I think it would be unwise legislation to pass this bill without a time limit on the bonds. The fact that we passed one bill does not foreclose us, if there was a mistake or an omission in it, from curing the defect in subsequent legislation.

Mr. STONE. Oh, to be sure. Mr. President, I am not going to proceed with the discussion, except to this extent: I wish to read what Secretary McAdoo stated on this subject, which is not very long, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall then leave the matter to the Senate. On page 28 of the House hearings on this bill Secretary McAdoo said:

The liberty bonds, as you know, were issued as 15-30 year bonds. They are what we call 15-30 year bonds. The Government has the right to call them at any time after 15 years, and they mature absolutely at 30 years. I believe that it was well to have that sort of option for the Government to take them up after 15 years.

Now, this is what I wish to call the attention of the junior Senator from Utah and others to:

I am contemplating issuing—I can not say just when, but before we get through with the whole operation—I contemplate issuing bonds with such maturities that they will in effect become serial issues ultimately. The difficulty is this: If we were issuing bonds to the limited number of experienced investors in this country, you would issue them with varying maturities; but if you are dealing with the great mass of the people, who are not familiar with investments, it is important to simplify as much as you can the provisions of the bonds, not only as to the maturities but as to taxation and everything else. We might say, for instance, that under a 5-year loan the total amount required might be $1,000,000,000. We might issue that as a 5-year loan, so that everybody could buy 5-year bonds. Then we might issue another loan at 6 years, another at 7 years, another at 9 years, and another at 10 years, as the case may be. I would rather do it that way than to issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds at one time, with maturities ranging from 5 to 10 years, because that would lead to some confusion. Then you might have all your subscriptions for the short installment and practically no subscriptions for the 10-year installments, or vice versa. Therefore I think it would be better to adjust the maturities, by making each issue have one maturity different from the others, so that they will become in effect a serial issue, without the inconvenience incident to issuing bonds of serial maturities at one time.

Mr. President, I understand it to be the policy of the Secretary, in handling this vast loan, to put out as far as possible short-time serial bonds; at least, to make that effort and do the very best he can along that line. But, sir, do not forget we are in this war. We must have money; we must finance the war; and suppose—just suppose—that the Secretary should fail to negotiate a certain character of loan. Suppose he should fail, if this amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin should be adopted, to put these five-twenties on the market and sell them, how would you run the war? The Treasury might be compelled to close for the lack of means to operate.

Conditions now are so different from what they have ever been before in the history of the Nation that I deem it wise to allow the Secretary to exercise the discretion authorized by this bill. I do not think that discretion will be abused. No one does.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it may be wise to limit by law the time for which a bond shall run, but it certainly will not be wise to place a minimum time on the issue of bonds provided in this bill.

We must remember that of the bonds provided in this bill, $4,000,000,000 are to be sold for the purpose of purchasing foreign bonds. The foreign bonds are to have the same provisions in them that our bonds have that we sell to raise the money to purchase the foreign bonds. Now, we know very well that the foreign countries can not pay their bonds in five years. Even if the war were to cease within a few months, there is no one country whose bonds we are purchasing to assist them in fighting the present war that would be able to take them up in five years.

Again, the Senate ought to take into consideration the fact in this bill we have started to follow the practice of England and the other countries now involved in war in issuing short-time obligations. For instance, to-day England is issuing five different kinds of short-time obligations and utilizing them all.

She is issuing war-savings certificates in denominations from £1 to £500. In the bill that is before the Senate to-day we are providing for war-savings certificates, and we are providing that they shall not be issued for a longer period than five years; and they will be issued in small denominations. In other words, Mr. President, it would be impossible from a financial point of view to have these $5 war-savings certificates issued and undertake to pay the interest either semiannually or annually, or at any given period within the five years. The expense of it would be so great that it would eat up the most of the certificates. Therefore, the way these war-savings certificates will be issued will be by an issue of the certificate upon the payment of about $4.17, upon which the certificate will be issued to the purchaser, and at the end of the five years' time the Government of the United States pays $5 for that certificate. In other words, the interest is deducted at the beginning at the rate of 4 per cent, and when the purchaser purchases it he does not pay the interest but simply pays about $4.17 and receives a certificate for $5 payable by the Government of the United States in five years. That does away with all of the expense of collecting interest at specified periods.

We expect to be just as successful in this country in placing that kind of certificate with the people of the United States as England has been in placing the same sort of Government security with the English people.

Next, England issues exchequer bonds, beginning with a denomination of £5, or in round numbers $25.

The next short-term issue she denominates as war-expenditure certificates. They are only issued for the term of two years in England. We have not gone that far in this bill.

Next, she has a short-time issue denominated ways and means advances. Those consist of temporary advances by the Bank of England.

The next is what they term their treasury bills, sometimes issued for a few months only, but in no case for more than two years.

All of these issues are used for the purpose of more universally distributing the Government obligations to the people in general.

Mr. President, at times England has had out $7,000,000,000 of different classes of obligations. I am speaking now of the treasury bills and the short-time certificates of indebtedness. When the amount gets so large that she feels that it is necessary to issue a long-term bond, then she provides for that issue. That is exactly what the Secretary of the Treasury expects to do in this country, Mr. President; and if these short-time certificates and these war-savings certificates are taken generally in the United States, I will assure the Senate that we will have all we can do to meet the payments for them, for there is not one of them that will be issued for a period of over five years. So, why now undertake to say that a bond shall have the privilege of redemption in 5 years and that it shall be paid within 20 years?

Mr. President, if the Senate wants to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, if he were present I would suggest that he amend that amendment so that it would read in this way:

Provided, That such bonds shall be redeemable and payable at the pleasure of the United States after five years— and so forth. The mere fact of providing that they shall be redeemable and not providing that they shall be payable of course would hardly be sufficient.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator whether his experience has enabled him to determine what is the most favored bond, the kind most readily sold—whether you should have a minimum and a maximum period of payment or not, and how much of a minimum and how much of a maximum is most favored?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, regular bond buyers, people who deal in bonds as a business—and that is where a great proportion of bonds are sold—would very much prefer to have a fixed time at which the bonds would be payable.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the fixing of a minimum and a maximum period, as to the favored time, depend very much upon the bond market, which can not with any certainty be anticipated by Congress in passing a fixed law?

Mr. SMOOT. I should have no objections to a maximum time or a minimum time if the conditions were normal. Conditions are not normal and we are not selling our bonds at the rate of interest at which England is issuing her bonds to-day. Our first bond issue was at 3½ per cent. This bond issue is at 4 per cent, partially taxable. I say "partially" because State taxation and some of the Federal taxes imposed do not apply to the bonds that are to be issued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if my friend will pardon me, he has passed the matter to which I was about to refer. I was only going to state to the Senator from Colorado, in connection with what my colleague stated, that in the case of bonds with which I have had something to do as counsel that were issued and sold by corporations, as much as 1 per cent interest has been differentiated between a long-time bond and a short-time bond. That is to say, as between a bond that is not redeemable within 20 years and one redeemable in 5 years, the 20-year bond would sell for a very much lower rate of interest.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think, Mr. President, that to fix in the law a maximum and a minimum period might not suit these times, for I believe the condition of the market has to be taken into consideration, and the condition to-day is not the same as it probably will be even two months from now. For that reason I think it would be better to have it subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

With relation to this testimony that the Secretary gave before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, I am in great hopes that he will attempt in some way to have serial bonds issued, if the market will justify it, because that will obviate and avoid to a large extent the accumulation of a fund for the purpose of redeeming them, which is always a loss to the Government. I know that in the city of Denver we issue bonds in this way: We make them payable in 10 years, and then provide that they shall be paid in the following five successive years—that is, one-fifth of the amount is paid in the eleventh year, one-fifth in the twelfth year, one-fifth in the thirteenth year, one-fifth in the fourteenth year, and one-fifth in the fifteenth year. That makes it so that we do not have to have an accumulated sinking fund; and a sinking fund is always a very undesirable thing. Denver levies a tax each year after 10 years for one-fifth of the bonds, and thereby it wipes out the bonds without any great hardship to anyone; and that, I understand, is somewhat the principle that the Secretary has indicated he might adopt in his testimony before the House committee. I hope he will be given the opportunity to try it.

Mr. SMOOT. No one is more opposed to conferring unlimited power upon any Government official than I am; but, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury has told the committee of the House, and he repeated it to the Finance Committee, what policy he intended to follow in issuing these bonds.

Speaking of the Civil War and how bonds were issued at that time, let me say that no one thought of serial bonds at that time. They are of later origin. Cities and counties and States are becoming accustomed to it, and they are issuing serial bonds and saving millions and millions of dollars of interest to the people.

The policy the Secretary of the Treasury is going to follow out will be virtually issuing a serial bond, and it is to be sold at the time and in such amount that in effect it will be a serial bond, but in reality the bond itself will not provide for other than one date of payment.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator let me interpolate—

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. The Civil War bonds were issued at a high rate of interest, reaching as high as 7.30 per cent, and they sold below par, sometimes as low as 83. Hence I have said the situation is so entirely different that there is no room for comparison, and not for that reason alone, but there are other reasons as well.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe the Senate would like to pass this bill to-day. I did intend to answer the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin as to what a 3½ per cent bond meant to a man who had an income of a million dollars as compared with an investment in some other security that was taxable. I called attention to that very fact when the revenue bill was before the Senate, but I do not think it ought to be taken into consideration in issuing these bonds, because the tax imposed under the revenue bill is not, we hope, to be imposed on the country longer than the close of the war, or at least not at the rates that are imposed in that measure.

Mr. President, I shall take no further time of the Senate now.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to take any time on this bill, but I have listened to most of the discussions so far, and it seems to me that I ought to offer one or two observations that occur to me as a member of the jury; I am not a member of the committee. I am satisfied that I am like the other Senators here who have listened to the debate. I have had no other purpose in view than to get the best kind of a law that could be secured for the Government. So I listened for a considerable length of time to a discussion as to whether the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] ought to have offered these amendments in committee or whether he was wrong in waiting to offer them here on the floor of the Senate. Those who have been so anxious that no time be taken have devoted more time to a discussion of that question than I shall take to discuss the entire proposition. To me, while that might be important as a matter of courtesy by one Senator to the committee of which he is a member, it has nothing whatever to do with the case before the Senate, any more than flowers that bloom in the springtime. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the one question that is important is, How can the Government save the most money?

We are going to issue bonds during the war, and while the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has very truly said the times can not be compared with the times of the Civil War, when we paid a much higher rate of interest and when the bonds sold below par, at the same time these times are different from what they would be if we had no war, and everybody knows it. We have to pay a higher rate of interest to borrow money now than we did before the war and a higher rate than we will have to pay after the war. It always increases the rate of interest that must be paid for borrowed money when we get into a war. That always has been the case, and I presume it always will.

The reason that to me is appealing why we should fix as short a time as possible when the Government should have a right to pay these bonds is that when peace comes again we can borrow money for a lower rate of interest. In five years from now, unless the history of all the past is to be reversed, we will be able to borrow money at 3 per cent, at least; probably at 2½ per cent. Then, why should we not retain the right to pay the bonds off in five years, not with the expectation now of actually paying them, but to do like we did after the Civil War—issue refunding bonds at a lower rate of interest and then take up the bonds that we have issued at a higher rate of interest. If you exclude from these bonds the right of the Government to do that, you make it impossible to do it, because the bonds will constitute a contract between the bondholder and the Government that nobody would want to violate, of course.

Therefore, unless there is some reason to the contrary, we ought to be able to refund these bonds with new bonds just as soon after the war as we possibly can. They put such a provision in practically all of the issues of the bonds in the Civil War, and they did that very thing. We have not paid some of them yet, but we have refunded all of them at a much lower rate of interest than we had to pay then. Why should we not safeguard the interests of the Government now as they did then? Even if they had not done it, why should we not do it now? Why is it not a good proposition?

We provide in this bill for the issuing of $7,000,000,000 of bonds and they are going to draw 4 per cent. The interest will be $280,000,000 a year. Assuming that they will run 30 years and that on the other hand we shall change the law and redeem them in five years, how much money would we save? We would save 1 per cent on $7,000,000,000 for 25 years, and 1 per cent on $7,000,000,000 is $7,000,000. It would be a little over, I think. I have not figured it out, but figuring it in my head as I go it would be in round numbers $2,000,000,000 that we would save for the taxpayers of the country. Now, why should we not do it?

Somebody says the bonds would not sell as well. When we had the other bond issue up I listened to a very able discussion of the question of serial bonds and I voted then to make them serial bonds. What did the men in the Senate who are recognized as the financiers then say? I do not say that they are any better financiers than any of the others, but they are recognized as financial experts. That means that they claim to know and no one has disputed them, and everybody assumes they do know. They said then that serial bonds would sell better than other bonds. If that is true, then we would not have to pay a higher rate of interest if we had the five years redemption proposition in them. But suppose we did. Let us say that we would have to pay 5 per cent instead of 4. Figure it out for yourself. That would mean 1 more per cent that you would have to pay for five years, and 1 per cent that you would save if the bonds were to run for 25 years, and the amount we would save even then would almost stagger the imagination. I do not believe there is anyone here who doubts but that these bonds would sell at par if we had the five years proposition in them; that is, making them redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after five years. Everybody would understand that they would be redeemed at the end of five years, because in all human probability we could borrow money for 3 per cent, perhaps for 2½ per cent, at that time, and we would issue other bonds and take them up.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] says the modern way is to issue serial bonds. I agree with that statement. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. Shafroth] has just told us how they issue bonds in the little city of Denver.

I want to apologize to the Senator when I call it a little city, but I am using that in a comparative sense. I am comparing it with the great United States. I suppose he would probably admit, blushing perhaps, that in that sense it would be little. They issue serial bonds and are doing well with them.

The Senator from Utah says that he is opposed as much as anybody can be to giving such wonderful power to any one man. Then he says the Secretary of the Treasury has it in mind now to issue serial bonds. Yet the Senator from Utah would not dare vote for an amendment that would put it in the law, or anything near like it. If the Secretary of the Treasury is going to issue that kind of bonds, what objection is there to putting something like it in the law. I would be the last man to put anything in the bill that in my judgment could in any possible way interfere with the sale of these bonds in such a way that the Government would lose any money by them; but if we had that five-year proposition in the bill, if we had to pay 6 per cent for the money and could borrow it in five years from now at 3 per cent, and nobody doubts that we can, we would save hundreds of millions of dollars even at that proposition.

The Senator from Wisconsin has referred us to what happened in the liberty bonds we have already issued at 3½ per cent. They must run 15 years. They can not run for more than 30 years without becoming due; but the Government has no right to pay them off until the expiration of 15 years. If what the Secretary of the Treasury did then is a criterion of what he will do under this bill, then he would save 15 years at 4 per cent. Now, take your pencil and a piece of paper and just figure out how many hundreds of millions of dollars the difference to the taxpayers of the United States would be between taking those bonds up at the end of five years and paying them at the end of 15 years.

There is not any doubt but that all of us want to do what it is for the best interest of the Government to do, and therefore I do not believe that we are much interested, so far as this proposition, at least, is concerned, as to whether this amendment ought to have been offered in committee or whether it ought to be considered now. Without any criticism of the amendment because it was not offered in the committee, to my mind it seems perfectly plain that it is to the financial interest of the Government to put this five-year proposition in the bill. I do not believe it ought to be more than five years. If it would be injurious and hurt the sale of bonds on the market, Congress in the Civil War period never would have repeated that error over and over again to the close of the war. As I said, even if they would not sell to within 2 per cent of what they would sell the other way, there would still be millions of profits if we would take them up in time of peace and borrow money at the rate we would have to pay at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I trust Senators will not be led to disparage the amendment which I have offered because forsooth upon the criticism of the Senator from Missouri I ought to have offered that amendment in the committee. Senators will recall here that we finished the consideration of the revenue bill upon the 10th of September about 7.30 or 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Senator from Missouri has referred to the fact that this bill had been messaged from the House to the Senate prior to that time, that it had been received by the Senate on the calendar day of the 7th of September, and that was three days before we concluded the consideration of the revenue bill. I do not know how it was with other Senators, but I do know that as for myself I had found it impossible, even if my attention had been called to the fact that that bill had been sent over from the House to the Senate, even to read the bill at the time it was received here. I do believe that no Member of this body had an opportunity during those days to look at the bill. We were in the midst of a great debate here upon the revenue bill. It had been before the Senate for a month. We had been meeting at 11 o'clock in the morning and continuing our sessions without interruption until close to 6 o'clock every single day, and all of the time, I think, of Senators between the hour of recess at about 6 o'clock and the time of meeting the next morning at 11 o'clock was taken up with the consideration of amendments and the preparation necessary for the work upon the floor of the following day in order to meet our obligations here.

I will say that I spent every single night during that month in my office in the Senate Office Building laboring upon that revenue bill. I reached my home, I think, on no single night earlier than 2 o'clock in the morning during that month, and I know, incidentally, that many other Members of the Senate were spending long hours upon the revenue bill.

We finished the revenue bill on the evening of the 10th of September at about 7.30 o'clock, and I was somewhat surprised to be advised that at 10 o'clock the next morning the Committee on Finance would be called together to consider this bond bill. We did meet at 10 o'clock on the morning of the 11th of September. I think I am safe in saying that not a member of the committee when we assembled in the committee room on the morning of the 11th had had an opportunity to read the bill at that time, and we took up the reading of the bill. We barely finished the reading of the bill, not with a view of considering it for amendments but just to inform ourselves as to the text of the bill, when the Senate met at 12 o'clock, and we adjourned and came upon the floor, to meet, when? At 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon of that 11th day of September, the same day, at which time the Secretary of the Treasury was scheduled to come before us to make a statement.

Just consider for a moment, Senators, I am not pleading for extenuation for I think I have been guilty of no remisses, but we remained in session from 2:30 o'clock until after the Senate adjourned, until nearly 6 o'clock on the 11th, listening to the statement the Secretary of the Treasury had to make and adjourned to meet the next morning at 10 o'clock. The next morning at 10 o'clock the Secretary of the Treasury returned with some of his assistants and occupied the time of the committee during the morning session, and we resumed at 2:30 the consideration of the bill for a report upon it. We concluded at about 5:30 o'clock on the 12th day of September, when a motion was made to report it out.

Mr. President, up to that point I had found no time in which to go back and delve into the history of the legislation of bond issues from the year 1800 down to 1899, but I did have the forethought to say to the committee as we were drawing near the conclusion of our consideration of the bill that it had occurred to me that there might be some question as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury should be invested with the wide discretion of fixing the time limit for these bonds to run, and I asked members of the committee who were older in service upon that committee than I if they were informed as to whether Congress in other wars had written into the legislation providing for bond issues specific terms with respect to the issuing of those bonds, or as to whether they had issued them under legislation similar to that which was before the committee. Though many of the members of that committee were on the committee at least when the Spanish War bonds were issued and when the Panama Canal bonds were issued, no one upon that committee was able to advise me with reference to the matter. So out of abundant caution, and with a view of dealing fairly by the committee, I said I should like to reserve the right, if upon investigation it seemed wise to do so, to offer amendments upon the floor with regard to that particular feature of the bill.

Mr. President, I completed my investigation of that matter and it took all of the time that I had to spare from the sessions of the Senate up to the time when I offered the amendments. I barely got the amendments in time to offer them last night.

So it does seem to me, Mr. President, that it is hypercritical to seek to prejudice the amendments which I have offered here or the amendment in particular which is now before the Senate by any criticism that I was negligent of my duties as a member of the committee. I treated the committee with the utmost of courtesy. I was not prepared to offer the amendments in the committee, because I did not know, and I had not had time to ascertain, what had been the previous legislation on the subject, covering over a hundred years in the history of this Government, but as soon as I could complete my investigation I brought these amendments into the Senate in the session of yesterday and submitted them.

Mr. President, I asked that they be not considered and disposed of yesterday late in the session when I was able for the first time to present them, because we had not to exceed 15 Members of the Senate present at that time, and it seemed to me too important a matter for the interest of the Government and the people of this country that those amendments should be considered and disposed of with a mere handful of the Senate here. I said that I regarded it of such great importance that I did wish to have, at least with respect to some of them, a quorum present when they were considered.

So, Mr. President, with some observations on the part of the acting chairman of the committee that he had hoped to dispose of this great bond bill in one single session of the Senate, he added that in view of the position which I had taken, and as I wanted a quorum to consider those important amendments, it would be necessary for the bill to go over. But this morning in the press of the country from one end of it to the other, from ocean to ocean, you will find in the headlines of every great newspaper the statement that "LA FOLLETTE held up the bond-issue bill."

We have reached a stage with respect to legislation pertaining to this war when if any Member of the Senate, following his duty as he conscientiously sees it here to safeguard the interests of the public, even asks that there shall be a constitutional quorum present when legislation involving billions of dollars is enacted, he is put in the position of being an obstructionist. It deters many Members of this body, I have no doubt, from discharging their full obligations to the public.

But whatever position the press of the country and Senators who are driving legislation through here under the whip and the spur may take as to the course that I deem it my duty to pursue regarding this legislation and legislation of like character, I shall not be swerved from what I regard as the right course.

Is a matter of one day's delay so important in the passage of a bill that is to obligate the people of this country on interest charges and on the details of bond issues running up into seven billions of money? Shall it come to be, Mr. President, that no Senator can ask for even 24 hours' time in which to have consideration in this body by a majority of its Members of such an important matter but that he is to be arraigned and criticized and put before the public as an obstructionist?

I think, Mr. President, that it is unfortunate. I think, Mr. President, that it is the introduction of a precedent into this great body which destroys its usefulness as a representative body to the people of the country.

I believe, Mr. President, that those who are taking that position, and who are forcing Senators here to submit to legislation which they conscientiously may question the wisdom of in some of its details, to remain silent in their places, are not serving not only the interests of the public but that they are not serving the interests of the Government in the prosecution of this war.

Now, Mr. President, I have placed before the Senate this amendment. I consider it one of paramount importance to the public interest and to the interests of the Government that this legislation should be safeguarded in the respects covered by the terms of the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that there should be a time limit as to the bonds, but I wonder whether five-twenty is not too short a time. Would it not be better to make it five-thirty?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, while I do not think so, and I wrote in the time limit according to my best judgment, I should be willing to take the sense of the Senate upon any modification of the amendment. I do, however, want to make one change in the amendment to perfect it, and that is that there shall be written in after the word "redeemable" the words "and payable." That will make the proposed legislation conform, I think, in terms to the phraseology of previous legislation. My attention has been called to that by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The amendment as I would modify it in that respect in order to perfect it before it is voted on is to amend the bill on page 3, at the end of line 4, by striking out the period and inserting a comma and the words:

Provided, That such bonds shall be redeemable and payable at the pleasure of the United States after 5 years from the date of issue, and payable 20 years from such date.

If the Senator from Kansas suggests that instead of "20 years" there should be substituted "30," I would not object to that. Mr. President, I do not want to do anything to hamper, retard, or embarrass the sale of these bonds.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think fixing the time limit at 30 years would help the sale of the bonds, and I should like to offer that amendment to the amendment; but I understand that the Senator from Ohio is going to propose an amendment to the amendment making the time 7 years instead of 5 years and 30 years instead of 20 years.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I will accept those suggestions.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Ohio offers that amendment, I should rather have the two propositions offered as one amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will accept those suggestions, and will modify my amendment by striking out the word "five" where it occurs and inserting the word "seven" before the word "years," and substituting the word "thirty" in the last line, where it occurs before the word "years," instead of "twenty," making the bonds payable at the option of the Government in 7 years, and payable in any event in not less than 30 years.

Mr. President, as I see some Senators on the floor who were not here when I previously addressed the Senate upon the amendment, I do want to remind them of the words of John Sherman in discussing this very subject. This is an extract from his address which was made on the 27th of February, 1868, when we were proposing to refund the bond issues of the Civil War in order to make better terms, as we had a right to do, under the terms upon which those bond issues had been made during the Civil War. Mr. Sherman said:

Our people have always looked upon a debt as a burden to be paid off as rapidly as possible, and public opinion and good policy would not tolerate the making of a very long loan; and I for one would not, under any circumstances, vote for one which it would not be within the power of the Government to redeem within 20 years.

Of course he was speaking of the conditions that then existed. Mr. President, I do not want to take up any more time of the Senate, and I ask for a ye-a-and-nay vote upon the amendment. Preliminary to that, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	New	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	James	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Smith, Md.
Brady	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Smoot
Brandeggee	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Sterling
Broussard	Kendrick	Polindexter	Stone
Culberson	Kenyon	Pomerene	Swanson
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Trammell
Dillingham	La Follette	Robinson	Vardaman
Fall	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
France	Lodge	Shafroth	Williams
Gerry	McKellar	Sheppard
Harding	McNary	Simmons

Mr. BROUSSARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on official business.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on important business. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may we now have a vote?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. By an arrangement with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], who is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the junior Senator from Georgia and the junior Senator from New York will stand paired, which will leave the Senator from Rhode Island and myself free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. GRONNA's name was called). The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If present, upon this question he would vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am requested to announce the necessary absence on official business of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I note the absence of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). I am informed that my pair, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is out of the city. Therefore I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. LEWIS. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. He is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I also desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Borah	Husting	King	Pomerene
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	La Follette	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Vardaman

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 4, after the word "prescribed," it is proposed to insert the words "not exceeding 4 per cent per annum."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the bill authorizes the issuance of certificates of indebtedness of the United States, but does not prescribe the rate of interest; it leaves that entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. So far as my investigation goes, that has never been done before; and even this Congress, when it authorized the issue of $2,000,000,000 of certificates on the 24th of April, 1914, fixed the rate of interest at which certificates should be issued. The amendment which I have proposed conforms to the bill passed by this Congress when we made our first bond issue and authorized the first issue of Treasury certificates. In section 6 of that act, passed on the 24th of April, we prescribed that the certificates to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury should draw interest "not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum." Either by oversight or otherwise the pending bill, which in section 5 authorizes the issue of $2,000,000,000 of additional certificates, or $4,000,000,000 of certificates in all, neglects to prescribe the maximum rate of interest beyond which the Secretary of the Treasury shall not go in issuing those Treasury certificates.

As that violates not only all the precedents in the issuing of evidences of debt against the Treasury heretofore enacted in the history of this Government, but also violates the precedent that this Congress itself established when it authorized the first issue of Treasury certificates, I have seen fit to offer this amendment.

I have made the limitation 4 per cent instead of 3½ per cent, the rate of interest fixed in the authorization of the first $2,000,000,000 Treasury certificates under the act of April 24, 1917, and I have fixed upon this maximum rate, because this bill increases the maximum rate for the bond issue over the amount fixed in the act of April 24, 1917, from 3½ per cent to 4 per cent; in other words, this bill itself prescribes that the Secretary of the Treasury can not exceed a 4 per cent rate of interest in the selling of the bonds or the negotiation of the bonds provided for in this measure, and I think, in accordance with all precedents not only before this war, but in this war, we ought to fix the same limitations upon the interest rate of these certificates of indebtedness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will take only a few minutes. I wish to read a statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury, which I think should appeal to the Senate, and which, of course, relates to the matter immediately in hand. Secretary McAdoo said:

Secretary McAdoo. In answer to that question I should like to refer to my discussion of the subject in the record yesterday and to repeat what I then said. It is very necessary for the Secretary to have the power to borrow on these short-time certificates at such rate of interest as may be certain to guarantee the sale of the certificates in the intervals between bond issues or until taxes are paid in. The present certificates can only be sold on a 3½ per cent basis. I can conceive that a condition might arise in the money market—we sometimes have tight money, due to crop moving or other cause, and it might not be possible to borrow money at 3½ per cent on the short-time Government obligations—a transient condition. It seems to me that we are taking a great risk in tying the hands of the Secretary in carrying forward these colossal operations if he has not some latitude as to the rate of interest on the short-term certificates.

Mr. MOORE. I brought that question forward again merely to ask this question: Suppose a general bond issue is authorized at a 4 per cent rate and you offer to pay, or are willing to pay, within your discretion, a higher rate on these certificates of indebtedness, what effect will that rate on these certificates have upon the bonds?

Secretary McAdoo. I do not think it would have any. Of course, it would require explanation. We should have to explain it. The average man would understand that for temporary loans you are always committed to the condition prevailing at the time you make the loan, the Government as well as an individual.

If you fixed an arbitrary rate on these short-time loans, and the condition of the money market should happen to be such that you could not place them at that rate, the operations of the Treasury Department would absolutely stop. We could not meet the situation.

Mr. President, it is not difficult to conceive that a situation might arise when, as the Secretary says, there is a close or tight money market. Bonds are being offered for sale and taxes have been levied which are in process of collection, but the actual money is not in hand, and so, owing to the enormous expenditures the Government is being daily put to, a condition might arise when the Secretary would be compelled to go into the money market with these short-time certificates to borrow money to bridge over an immediate emergency; and if it so happened that at that time money was difficult to get, and bearing high rates of interest, bankers and other capitalists who had money to loan would not loan it to the Government at 4 per cent if for the time being they could get 5 per cent, for example. So, as these certificates of indebtedness are issued only as short-time emergency securities, to be taken up as soon as money flows into the Treasury from the sale of bonds or taxation, it seems to me that it would be wise to leave a discretion of the kind proposed in the Secretary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not going to ask for the yeas and nays upon any of the other amendments that I have to present, either the one that is pending or those that I shall offer following this one. The Senate has already voted upon much the most important amendment which I shall propose, and in my view has taken its position with regard to safeguarding the public interest. I am content to accept the situation as I find it here, and therefore I simply ask for a viva voce vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the words "denomination or" and insert in lieu thereof the word "in," and, after the word "denominations," in said line, it is proposed to insert the words "of $20 or some multiple of that sum."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, the purpose of this amendment is that the bonds issued shall be of small denominations and within the reach of small purchasers. I do not ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President, but will take the sense of the Senate by a viva voce vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 20, it is proposed to strike out the period after the word "interest" and insert a colon and the words: "Provided, That such reduction or increase of allotments of such bonds shall be made under general rules to be prescribed by said Secretary, and shall apply to all subscribers similarly situated."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as far as I am able to do so, representing the Finance Committee, I consent that that amendment may be agreed to and go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 23, after the word "rates," it is proposed to insert the words "not exceeding 4 per cent per annum."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should be glad if the same disposition would be made of that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 24, after the letter "(b)," it is proposed to insert the words "United States income taxes," so that, if amended, it will read:

or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) United States income taxes, graduated additional income taxes—

And so forth.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The effect of that amendment is to make the bonds taxable to the extent of their being subject to income taxes as well as surtaxes.

Mr. STONE. In other words, the bill subjects these bonds to what are called surtaxes. The Senator from Wisconsin would subject the bonds to normal taxes as well as the surtaxes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I can not but think that if that were done it would very seriously embarrass the marketing of the bonds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 7, after the word "prescribe," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That if any such war-saving certificates be offered by the holder thereof for redemption and upon such application be redeemed before maturity there shall be deducted from the accrued interest an amount not in excess of 1 per cent per annum of the principal for the time such certificate has been outstanding.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say in explanation of that amendment, in order that it may appear in the RECORD, that section 6, providing for these war-savings certificates, contains this language:

Each war-saving certificate so issued shall be payable at such time, not exceeding five years from the date of its issue, and may be redeemable before maturity, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

It has been stated in the public press that the Secretary intends to issue these war-savings certificates on a basis of 4 per cent, but that if the holders of such certificates who may be pressed for money desire to have them redeemed prior to the period of maturity, then the rate of interest upon such certificates will be reduced to 2 per cent. Indeed, according to my recollection, the Secretary made that statement before the Ways and Means Committee. I believe this to be an excessive reduction, and that if it is adhered to it will materially reduce the subscription to these war-savings certificates; so I have prepared an amendment the effect of which is to limit the reduction that may be made for premature redemption to 1 per cent per annum of the principal of the certificates.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that these certificates do not bear interest. The interest is discounted in advance. The Secretary, under the authority here conferred, would require books to be issued, as in other countries where substantially the same policy is pursued, to a purchaser, who would buy stamps of a certain value from the postmaster and put them on successive pages of the book until he had paid by these stamps the full amount required to be paid. If it were a $100 bond he would, through these stamps, pay about $83—the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] whispers to me the amount would be $83.40—and at the maturity, five years after the issuance of the book, he would be paid $100. So that the interest is discounted in advance; and I think the proposal of my friend from Wisconsin, if put into the statute, would be confusing if not impossible of successful administration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The following amendment has been reserved for a separate vote in the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, the amendment to be found on line 23, where, after the words "not exceeding," the words "one-seventh" are stricken from the bill and the words "one-fourth" are inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon concurring in all other amendments save the reserved amendment.

The amendments not reserved were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is upon concurring in the reserved amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. STONE, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate adjourn until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, September 16, 1917, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 15, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, for the history of our past, for the auspices of the present, in spite of the pessimists, and for the hopes and ever-widening promises of our future as a Nation. Impress, we beseech Thee, every American citizen with the great responsibility resting upon him, especially these, Thy servants, the lawmakers of the Nation, and guide us evermore by Thy counsels in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2380. An act granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors; to the Committee on the Territories.

S. 2527. An act authorizing appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2334. An act to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2701. An act to provide for the awarding of campaign badges to the members of the Dental Corps, United States Army, and fixing the regulations for awarding same; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2489. An act to create two additional associate justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 82. An act to transfer Frederick W. Cobb from the list of chief machinist, United States Navy, to the list of chief pay clerks, United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 2746. An act to authorize the recommissioning of former officers of the Regular Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 93. Joint resolution for improving Willapa Harbor and River, Wash.

CONTROL OF EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3932, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 3932, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please tell us what the bill is?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice the Senate amendments have departed entirely from the original theory of the bill as introduced and passed by the House.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the reason why we want to put it in conference.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the bill should be adopted in the form in which it is returned to the House, I shall feel constrained to object, for the reason that it virtually duplicates the service and takes away from the control of the export division some of its work and places it in charge of the Director of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that I am very much in favor of the House bill. I do not want to adopt the Senate bill as it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then there is assurance that nothing of that sort will be agreed to when the bill is returned from conference?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and get a better bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am glad to have that assurance.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we shall have a better bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so, because the bill as passed by the Senate has duplicated what is now being performed by another department under the direction of the President.

Mr. WALSH. What committee has reported this?

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. WALSH. There was a bill on another calendar dealing with the storage and transportation of explosives. I wondered if this measure was designed to take the place of that other bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that it is; but I think if we pass this bill, covering the control of the storage of explosives, we would not want another to do the same work.

Mr. WALSH. I wondered how this measure came in and was given priority over the measure heretofore passed by the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. I could not answer that; but this bill came into the House as the result of requests of the War Department and the Navy Department, and they thought it was necessary that during the time of war there should be some control over these explosives.

Mr. WALSH. That was the very reason given for reporting to the House the other measure that I have in mind. I wanted to know if there was any conflict between the two.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think we ought to have two.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. FOSTER, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. GARLAND.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; and, pending that request, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be concluded in two hours, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5949, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House, the general debate is limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the other by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the House is under, as it usually is, a particular debt to the very able and industrious chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and he gave to the House yesterday a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures that might make it seem unnecessary for anyone else to undertake to cover the same field. And yet we are engaged in events of such tremendous magnitude that there can not be too often stated and restated the tremendous financial burden that this country is being called upon to carry in order that there may be a growing appreciation of our undertaking—I say a “growing appreciation” because that man is rare who is able now to appreciate the extent and magnitude of present world events—and the one fact that needs to be borne in upon the people of America is the tremendous undertaking that these United States entered upon when they became one of the belligerents in this world war.

Day after day, as the members of the committee sat hearing the details of estimates running into the billions, did we have to enlarge our view and our conception of events that are transpiring and that are to transpire. So I am sure the House will pardon me if I undertake again to give somewhat of the totals of receipts and expenditures that are contemplated for the fiscal year 1918. I shall print with my remarks the details of all appropriations that have been made, but I shall not endeavor to detain the House now by an enumeration of all the details, which in speaking would only cause confusion in following the conclusions I draw and which I desire the House to appreciate.

There will have been a total of appropriations if the bill as now proposed is enacted into law and if those bills that are pending in the Senate should be enacted into law substantially as they have passed the House of $11,288,643,452.33. From that can be eliminated—and in this regard only do my figures differ from similar figures presented by the chairman touching this phase of the financial question—there can be eliminated $164,167,650, made up of sixty-odd millions for the sinking fund, which, while it is a legal liability, is one that has always been ignored by the Government for many years past; ten millions that was in the war-insurance bill, but has been subsequently repealed; $68,419,650, which represents deficiencies on account of the year 1917, and which, therefore, should not be included in the consideration of the financial statement for the fiscal year 1918; and the sum paid for the West Indian Islands before June 30, 1917, of twenty-five million, making a total of $164,167,650, which, subtracted from the figures I have given, would leave a total appropriation that has been authorized and probably will be expended during the fiscal year of $11,124,475,802.33.

Against that is to be put the following statement of estimated revenue. The ordinary revenues obtained from various bills for the conduct of the Government irrespective of war are $1,333,500,000. The postal revenues are $334,000,000; from the new revenue bill about $2,400,000,000, a total of $4,067,500,000.

The amount of revenue from bonds, exclusive of those for financing the loans to the allies—and I am, for the most of this statement, excluding those loans for obvious reasons, because I am undertaking to show the situation that faces the country touching its own expenditures and assuming for the present that the liabilities it assumes for bond issue for the purpose of financing the allies will be offset by the liability of the allies to this Government for such sum, which liability in due course will be paid—under the first bond issue of $2,000,000,000, bonds authorized to meet expenses of the Danish West Indian Islands, Panama Canal, Alaska Railway, and so forth, $475,000,000; war-saving certificates of five-year term under the pending bond bill, $2,000,000,000, or a total bond issue of $4,475,000,000, which, added to the estimated revenues, would give you a total revenue from taxation, bonds and war-saving certificates, of $8,542,500,000. That leaves as an amount yet to be financed, in order to take care of expenditures that will have been authorized when this bill now before the committee shall have become a law, of $2,581,975,802.33.

Now, the Treasury Department has recently given out a statement, which was put in the RECORD by one of the Senators, which shows that they estimate a deficit of $3,567,370,000. That represents a difference between the figures I have just given you of a little less than a billion dollars. The reason for that difference is not because of a mistake in calculation, but is because of the different basis upon which the total was arrived at.

I have presented to you a deficit of about $2,600,000,000, based upon the actual appropriations that have been made and will have been made, including this bill for the fiscal year 1918 and the estimated revenues, as I have stated, whereas the Treasury Department's statement is based upon an estimated expenditure for the fiscal year of 1918, irrespective of what has been appropriated or is now proposed to be appropriated. In other words, they estimate roughly a billion dollars more of expenditure than we are now providing for by appropriation. The explanation of that is found in the fact that in a number of instances, where the committee felt that later on we could obtain more accurate information touching the detailed needs of the department, we did not give the full sum that it was stated would be spent during the fiscal year 1918, and knowing that Congress would be in session in the winter and in the spring, and knowing that we had provided sums more than sufficient to carry the Government past that time, we left for consideration when we might have more detailed information a number of matters that evidently the Treasury Department have figured in their statement as a probable expenditure in 1918.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. So the Committee on Appropriations deemed it wise to cut $1,000,000,000 of estimates made by the Treasury Department out until information could be obtained as to the necessity of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. In point of fact, the Committee on Appropriations has cut out something like $900,000,000, or nearly a billion dollars. But I assume that the statement made by the Treasury Department has been made upon estimates given by departments as to their probable expenditures during 1918 and does not take into consideration whether or not those expenditures have or will be authorized and provided for.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no certainty but that there will be estimates for a larger amount than the Treasury suggests?

Mr. SHERLEY. I grant the gentleman that none of us here are wise enough in this emergency to span the future by any thought by which we are able to say what will be the actual needs of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman made any estimate, in his deductions, as to the percentage of total appropriations which will not be utilized during the fiscal year?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not. Manifestly there will be, as there always is, a certain percentage of moneys that are appropriated that can not be and is not expended; but I have thought it simpler and better that I present to the committee a statement of actual liabilities that the Government was prepared to assume as the result of appropriations made, together with a statement of estimated revenues; and I only mentioned the statement of the Treasury in order that the House might have an understanding as to why there seemed to be a difference of $1,000,000,000 between the estimated deficit, on the part of the Committee on Appropriations and the Treasury Department.

Now, using the figures that I have given you, of a total appropriation of $11,124,000,000, and of estimated revenues from taxation of $4,067,500,000, and assuming that the deficit that we now contemplate of approximately $2,600,000,000 is met by bond issue exclusively and not by additional taxation and revenue thereby raised, the percentage of revenues raised by taxation to the total of appropriations—always excluding bond issues to provide funds for loans to allies—is 36.5+ per cent. In other words, eliminating our loans to the allies and including the ordinary expenses of the Government and the ordinary revenues by ordinary taxation for that purpose, we will have financed the war by providing through taxation for 36.5+ per cent of the amount, and the balance by bond issue. If you exclude $1,000,000,000 as the ordinary expenses of the Government exclusive of war expenditures, and if you exclude $1,000,000,000 derived from taxation to take care of that ordinary expenditure of the Government, you will then have a percentage of taxation to bond issue of 30.2 per cent as against 69.8 per cent by bond issue.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not catch the final percentage given by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want the House to bear in mind what is excluded, because that changes the percentages.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wish the gentleman would state the percentages again.

Mr. SHERLEY. Excluding $1,000,000,000 of expenditure for ordinary governmental purposes and excluding $1,000,000,000 of money raised by taxation to take care of those ordinary expenditures, you would then have a relationship of 30.2 per cent of revenues raised by taxation as against 69.8 per cent raised by bond issues.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman differs about 5 per cent from the estimate given by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in making his estimates, figured that the percentage of revenue to total appropriations was about 35 per cent; and he figured that, as far as I can gather from an examination of his remarks in the Senate, by including all expenditures of the Government for 1918 and all revenues of the Government. When I use that basis I arrive at a percentage of 36.5 per cent of revenue from taxation and the balance from bond issue.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the gentleman and Senator SMOOT agree, when the deductions are made?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think, as we come within about 1½ per cent, when we are dealing in these huge figures, it may properly be said that there is no great difference between us as to the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. We are issuing about $2.80 of bonds to $1.20 of cash, according to the figures the gentleman has given.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not worked it out in that form.

Mr. MADDEN. And I would like to know if the gentleman can tell what is the ratio of tax revenues to the bond issues in England, excluding her loans to the allies?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think Senator SMOOT in the speech to which both the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and myself have referred, figured that in England the percentage raised by taxation was 26 per cent; in France, 14.5 per cent; Germany, 14.5 per cent; and Canada, 8 per cent. That, however, would include, in the case of England, I assume, her liabilities as measured not only by her own expenditures but by her financing of her allies, and I am now going to give you the percentage which would include the $7,000,000,000 that we are proposing to loan to our allies.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman a moment ago excluded $1,000,000,000 for ordinary expenses. I did not understand what the other $1,000,000,000 which he excluded was.

Mr. SHERLEY. I excluded $1,000,000,000 of expenditures, and I also excluded $1,000,000,000 of revenue raised by taxation. Manifestly if you are going to make such exclusion, you must do it on both sides of the ledger; and the result of that is to reduce the percentage, because it takes from the $4,067,500,000 of revenue that we raise by taxation $1,000,000,000, and leaves to be raised by taxation about $3,067,500,000, and it reduces the total of estimated expenditures by $1,000,000,000.

Mr. SLOAN. Do the figures submitted of England's expenditures and the percentage obtained by taxation and by bond issue include the ordinary expenses of England for the year, or do they exclude ordinary expenditures?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not able to answer the gentleman definitely. I have not personally verified the statement. The Senator from Utah, Mr. SMOOT, simply stated:

Now, let me call the attention of the Senate to the percentages raised by direct taxation by other countries involved in the present great war. They have been in this war for three years, and we are just entering it.

He then gives the percentage; but there is nothing that definitely states whether there are included the ordinary expenses of the respective Governments that he subsequently enumerates.

Mr. SLOAN. Then you presume that the basis of the English figures is the same basis as that which the Senator from Utah used as to the United States?

Mr. SHERLEY. I assume so.

Including loans of $7,000,000,000 to our allies, and including all expenditures and receipts for all purposes, and that the deficit that is estimated of about $2,600,000,000 is to be met by a subsequent bond issue of that amount, the percentage of taxation to total appropriations will become 22.4+ per cent of taxation as against 77.5+ per cent of bonds. In other words, if you take the liabilities of the Government without regard to any offset by virtue of the liability of our allies to us for loans made to them, but consider that as a complete liability of this Government, we would have, to finance it under the present program, assuming that the deficit of two and a half billions is to be met by a new bond issue of that amount, a percentage of 22.4+ per cent of taxation and the percentage of 77.5+ per cent of bond issue.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is not that about the relative proportion of taxes to bonds, or an even larger relative proportion, than has maintained in the case of financing the war by other countries? England, as I understand it, has the highest percentage of taxation, it being about 25 per cent, and all other countries much less.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that is true; and yet I do not think we ought to lull ourselves into a false position or false sense of security. There is to-day in England a very considerable and reputable class of people who are criticizing the financial management of the British Empire because it is claimed they are not raising a sufficient proportion by taxation and are depending too much upon bond issues.

This is what I desire to say to the House. I have no desire to arbitrarily fix percentages. The man who undertakes to do it and who believes in the finality of his percentages displays his ignorance of the problem more than anything else; but this I do desire to impress, that the credit of a nation, as is the case with the credit of an individual, is always best maintained by paying cash whenever it can. [Applause.] If you are to maintain the credit of this Nation at its highest point, you must show a willingness to actually provide, as far as you properly can, for the current expense, and to the extent that you can not that you provide by taxation for the meeting of the interest upon that indebtedness and the early retirement of the principal. I have twice before called attention to the fact that the fatal mistake of the Civil War financing was that the Congress did not until the third year of the war undertake to really tax the people, and as a result the constant issuing of bonds and the bringing in of fiat-money issues served to weaken tremendously the credit of the Government and prolonged the war many months, and it was only later on that the hard lessons learned in the early financing of that war forced the Government to levy real taxes upon the people, and from that time on the credit of the Government improved.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I would ask the gentleman if in his judgment it is not true that in determining the amount of revenue that a nation should raise by taxation we must necessarily consider the wealth of the nation? In other words, when we are about to determine how much money we shall take, we must determine how large a reservoir we have to draw upon?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. KEATING. And so a comparison between this country and other countries should perhaps be made upon the basis of the wealth of this country as compared with that of other countries?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is manifest that a man of limited means can not pay the same amount of cash out that a man of greater means can, both confronted by the same kind of expenditures.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true also that we are getting back in this investment a large part of the money appropriated by the Government, and is not the Government getting in return a large part of this appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know just what the gentleman means by his question.

Mr. DOWELL. I mean that most of the appropriations that we are making are expended in our country.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; that is always true; but I have never given much weight to the argument that you could afford to spend money because it went back among the people. It does go back, but it does not always go back on the same basis that it came from them.

Mr. DOWELL. But should not the ones who receive it make the contributions to carry on this war?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably; but I want to say this to the House, and repeat what I said the other day: I have no desire to in any way remove from the backs of those who are making great profits out of the war the burden of paying great taxation, and I do not think there is much fear of that happening, because their number numerically is not very great, but after you have taxed them all that you can legitimately, if you are not to cripple some of the necessary activities that they carry out for the Government, you must then have the courage to tax the great mass of the people. I do not mean by that that the taxation should be upon the same ratio. I have repeatedly said that mathematical equality is not necessarily equity, but that the true theory of taxation is to place the burden with an appreciation of the ability to bear.

And therefore it necessarily follows that men of great income can pay a very much larger percentage of their incomes in taxation than the men of small incomes, and you finally get to a point where a man's income so nearly represents his living expenses that any added burden of taxation placed upon him would prove a very great hardship. We ought always to bear in mind that distinction. But I also realize the frailty of human nature; I realize that the average legislator is very much quicker to vote a full proportion of taxes on a limited number of men of great incomes than they are to vote the proper proportion upon the average man, because the average man has the greater voting strength; and what I want to see in this day, when men are being called upon to give their lives, to make the supreme sacrifice, is that we who are charged with great responsibility should have the courage, irrespective of our own political fortunes and our own political fears, because they are frequently distinct—the American voters have more belief and faith and courage than we sometimes credit them with—that we should have the courage to levy also the proper proportion of taxes upon the great mass of the people, and I believe that these people desire that we should do it. They want to feel that they are carrying their proper burden of this war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. REAVIS. I agree with the gentleman entirely, but does not the gentleman believe it is quite as important to consider how much we are going to leave with the individual as to consider how much we are going to take?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably, and it is because I so believe that I stated I did not believe in a mathematical ratio of taxation, that I believed it ought to be based with a consideration of the ability to bear, which is but another way of stating what the gentleman has just inquired of me.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. From the census statement of the wealth of the country of $185,000,000,000, if I recall properly, I find that the farm property—real estate—is $110,000,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I think I anticipate his inquiry. I am not confusing in my mind I hope what so many men seem to confuse, the difference between wealth and liquid wealth. The wealth of a nation is made up in great part of what is not liquid and therefore is not immediately available for taxation purposes, and the man who assumes that because the wealth of a nation is so much that he can necessarily take a certain amount in taxation without seriously disturbing the economic situation assumes what is frequently untrue.

I recognize that you can not undertake to so tax the liquid wealth of this country as to bring about stagnation in business and in the financing of enterprises, and that when you do you simply make future returns to the Government more difficult and require more and more that the Government should finance enterprises necessary for the war that otherwise might have been financed by private capital.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; I quite agree with the gentleman in his statement, and yet the multiplied millions of people in this country owning two-thirds of the wealth of the country have not been largely taxed so far by revenue legislation. Take Iowa—

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman in a sense, and yet there must always be carried in mind along with his statement a realization of the fact that the people of moderate means bear by indirect and direct taxation a burden that leaves them but little leeway. So that it is unfair simply to estimate the burden that they carry by the amount of taxation that you can point to that the Federal Government places upon them.

Mr. CANNON. To illustrate what I mean, take the State of Iowa, take the State of Nebraska, take the State of Kansas, all represented, and properly so, for their greater per capita wealth, and I think, considering our population, they have a greater per capita wealth than any similar population to be found in the United States. They have not so far been reached by excise provisions, by income provisions, and so on. I merely speak of that because there seems to be from time to time gentlemen who are uneasy about these burdens.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I have tried to emphasize, and I trust I have, the need of Congress levying a proper tax upon the mass of the people, and where there is any group that is not bearing its fair proportion, rich or poor, it ought to be made to bear its fair proportion; but I again say that fair proportion can not be measured by a mathematical ratio. Now, further than that I can not go.

Mr. SLOAN, Mr. POWELL, and Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. CANNON. I agree with the gentleman. I merely wanted to call his attention to it.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman now yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], as I was unable a moment ago to yield to him.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, the gentleman believes that the percentage of taxation levied against the people must be based on the total expenditures rather than upon any given percentage and division; that is to say, that if we have a large expenditure the rate of taxation would be smaller than if we have a small expenditure?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will put it in another form. I would tax the people heavily enough to make them feel the weight of taxation without unduly crippling those activities that ought to continue during these times. Now, I qualify by saying "those activities that ought to continue during this time," because no man could have sat in the Committee on Appropriations week after week and week after week and heard the estimates of quantities of things needed for the Government without realizing the Government can not obtain them and at the same time have the energy of the American people engaged in activities the same as if no war was going on. With a shortage of steel, with a shortage of lead, of all the basic metals, with a shortage of lumber, it becomes almost a crime for men to use those things in unnecessary production, no matter whether it means an expansion of that particular man's business or not. And one of the things that has always to be borne in mind and stated and restated is that, unfortunately, in dealing with the need of the Nation you must lose sight of—aye, and do apparent injustice in many instances—to the individual as such. But that will happen all along the line.

As I said, some men will give lives, other men will give money, other men may give nothing. The burden is not going to be equal, but we ought to try to make it as equal as we can. But if we stop to listen to the complaints of a particular man who says, "Your program, necessary though it be for the Government, will curtail my activities, and I have a right to go along and expand my business, and therefore you ought not to do this," we can never go forward with this war. We must consider the Nation. We dare not stop to hear the complaint of the individual.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment there?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] used some perfectly proper liberties with Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa, and I want to remark that, taking the bill of the other body as a basis, the States of Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska will increase their number of taxpayers to the Treasury of the United States in a greater proportion than any other States in the Union—

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, my time is running.

Mr. SLOAN. One is the reduction of exemptions and the other is shifting the taxes from the automobile manufacturers to the owners themselves.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am perfectly willing to leave the quarrel between Illinois and the States of Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa to the able Representatives of those respective States.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman gotten his figures in shape so that he can tell us what the bonded indebtedness of the country will be at the end of the year as here specified?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know. I can not tell the gentleman that without taking into calculation the existing bonded indebtedness of the United States, which I have not now before me.

I can tell the gentleman what has been authorized in the way of new bond issues since the war started.

Mr. FESS. That is what I wanted to know, excluding the loans to the allies.

Mr. SHERLEY. There have been authorized bond issues for the allies to the extent of $7,000,000,000, and there have been authorized bonds for our own use of $2,000,000,000, and war-saving certificates of $2,000,000,000, which would make $11,000,000,000, and then there is an authorization for a reissue under changed form of $475,000,000 of bonds, which would make a total of $11,475,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. FESS. Then you would exclude from that—

Mr. SHERLEY. I exclude from that those certificates for a year which might be called "till" money, to meet expenditures from day to day, and are expected to be taken care of by the proceeds of bond issues, but I do not exclude certificates of five years, because they go beyond mere till money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed until he concludes what he wishes to say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think I can conclude in five minutes.

Mr. GILLET. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I desire to make but one further statement touching this financial phase of the question before going to the bill itself.

Taking the bond issues that have now been authorized and certificate issues for use for ourselves, excluding the bond issues to provide loans to the allies and also including the revenues that are to be raised from all sources, the ratio at present is 47.6 of tax revenue to 52.3 of bond issues. Of course, that does not make provision for the two billion six hundred million of deficit, that I assume, nor the three and one-half billions that the Treasury estimates. It only represents the actual situation now. At this moment we have only issued for our own use, in the way of bond issue, bonds to the extent of $4,475,000,000.

Now, I desire very briefly to call attention to the summary of the bill that is before the House. The amount in the pending bill, as reported, of cash expenditure is $3,775,979,370, and the amount it is proposed to offer as amendments, due to the fact that after the hearings had been completed, there were sent in additional estimates, is $993,604,000, making a total of $4,769,583,370.

The contract authorizations in the bill as reported to the House total $1,035,000,000, and the contract authorizations that will be proposed as amendments to the bill total $1,219,202,750, or a total of contract authorizations of $2,254,202,750, or a grand total of cash and contract authorizations of $7,023,786,130.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question at that point?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Am I right in assuming that a very large portion of that money will not really in fact be expended in this fiscal year?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course the contract authorizations are not expected to be expended in 1918; and I will say, in passing, that they were not included at all in my totals of expenditures.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, as to how much of the eleven-odd billion dollars will be expended, no man can tell. Usually there is a small percentage of annual appropriations that are not expended. But we must appreciate that in this year there will be, and there ought to be, an effort to expend all of it; and for my part I hope we will not try to make a saving in that way, by not spending moneys that have been appropriated for necessary purposes, because right now time is more important than money to this country and to the success of this war. [Applause.]

Now, of the estimates that were submitted both in the pending bill originally and subsequently they total $7,065,526,525, so that there is an apparent decrease made by the committee of only $41,740,000. But there is an actual reduction very much beyond that, because we are carrying into the bill a provision of $849,000,000 in connection with the emergency shipping fund, and $100,000,000 for ordnance which was not estimated for at all, and therefore is not included in the figures of estimates that I have given, so that there actually has been made a reduction over estimates submitted of $990,740,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to have two or three minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SHERLEY. This reduction does not necessarily mean that that amount of money will be permanently saved. It represents, as I said a while ago, in a number of instances a declination on the part of the committee to appropriate moneys for the whole year, because we realized that later we would get more accurate information that would enable us the better to judge of the actual needs. For instance, quite an amount has been cut in regard to the pay, and in some instances in regard to transportation and subsistence, because it was perfectly apparent to the committee that the estimates that were submitted, based upon the given number of men for a given period of time, could not in point of fact be realized; that there would not be that number of men for that period of time to be paid, or to be transported, or to be fed, as the case might be. But in no instance has the committee made a cut that ought in any way to embarrass the Government in doing those things that are necessary.

The committee also carries a provision here, referred to by the chairman, which I consider to be of very great importance, though it marks a departure from anything heretofore done. We authorize an indebtedness to the extent of $100,000,000 to be incurred in connection with ordnance matters, for things not appropriated for or authorized. Now, the purpose of that was simply this: There are coming up almost every day and almost every hour of every day new projects, not heretofore contemplated and which could not be anticipated. This war is developing from day to day; our information is becoming fuller and fuller as the result of the active assistance of our allies. If the department, before beginning what may be a tremendous undertaking in connection with ordnance, is forced to come to Congress and get an approval of their plans, much valuable time is lost, and that much hurt done to our cause, because the one thing that will in the last analysis determine the fighting force that we can put on the front is going to be field artillery and ordnance of lighter character, but chiefly the former, because it takes a longer time to prepare, and anything that can be done to speed up the procurement of field artillery is of the utmost vital importance. For that reason the committee believed it was warranted in giving the War Department a leeway of $100,000,000. It is a great sum, as we used to think of sums, but it is negligible compared with the importance of getting this work done.

We had brought to our attention during the hearings a delay that would probably occur of several months until this bill could be passed, in financing certain private corporations for the enlargement of their plants or the creation of new ones, for the building of certain field artillery, and a plan was worked out by which we were enabled to use for that purpose money in advance of the actual appropriations carried in this bill. If that method had not been worked out it would have resulted in a delay of two or three months in starting, and a delay greater than that in completing, because there is a growing congestion all the time in getting supplies and materials, and any delay now is measured in greater delay later on in the process of manufacturing.

Now, these vast sums that are carried in this bill are due to two or three main causes. First, we are enlarging the building program for ships tremendously. We had authorized a program that contemplated an expenditure of $750,000,000. We are now authorizing a program that contemplates finally an expenditure little short of $2,000,000,000. Then the ordnance people came with estimates that ran up to something over one and three-quarter billion dollars. Part of that was represented in an increased need of equipment for the first million men, not anticipated at the time that the first estimates were submitted, and, I ought to say in fairness, which could not be well anticipated.

Part of it was due to an increased price in obtaining these things, and, of course, the larger part of it was due to making provision for the equipment of a second million men. When I speak of equipment for a million men, I mean not only equipment for the million men in the field, but I mean the 25 per cent reserve at the bases abroad, a 25 per cent reserve that will have to be provided to take care of the wastage of men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am much indebted to the committee, and will not further detain them. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLET. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire for one moment to discuss the bill under consideration. I concur most heartily in the able report of the Committee on Appropriations and the very luminous explanation made by the members of that committee upon this floor.

I do desire for a few moments to have your indulgence under the privilege given me of speaking in explanation of the strange defeat of woman suffrage in Maine last Monday, and to answer, if possible, the question that is being forced upon me as one of its Representatives, "What brought about this strange and amazing result?"

On Monday last the men of Maine, by a vote of 2 to 1, defeated an amendment to our constitution giving equal suffrage to the women of Maine. The enemies of suffrage have seen in that defeat the future failure of suffrage in the Nation. The friends of suffrage everywhere have been too dazed to give an explanation of that defeat. Six months ago such a result was impossible in Maine. Six months ago two great political parties in my State stood a unit for woman suffrage, recommending it in their political platforms. The legislature of my State by almost a unanimous vote submitted suffrage to the people of Maine. The great press of my State were almost a unit in favor of suffrage. The voters of Maine six months ago were almost unanimous for woman suffrage in my State. And here let me say that the men of Maine are intelligent, they are patriotic, and, while they are conservative, they always stand for progress in government. But the men of Maine will never forgive the man or the woman who in this time of war and peril and danger in this Government will attempt to lay a single extra burden upon or obstruct the President in carrying on this great war. [Applause.] The men of Maine stand with the President at the present time in his great war policies. Regardless of political party, they are with him to a man for the success of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. I would rather not. It will break the line of my thought. I have no prepared speech.

Mr. GORDON. That is the reason I wanted to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. HERSEY. During the brief recess of this House last month I paid a visit to my State. I spoke at the University of Maine. I spoke at a great many patriotic meetings. I met the men of Maine everywhere, and I put to them always the question, "What about woman suffrage in this State?" And men who had always been for woman suffrage, men who to-day stand for woman suffrage, said to me, "I have up to the present time favored woman suffrage, but at this election I am going to vote against it to rebuke the women who placed upon their banners at the White House gate the words 'Kaiser Wilson.'" [Applause.] And those men of Maine who favor suffrage, who respect their women, who believe in woman suffrage, 75,000 of them, refused to vote, and the remainder, a few of them, went to the ballot box and rebuked the pickets at the White House gates. [Applause.] To show that I am not wrong in my statement, the press of my State that supported woman suffrage is unanimous as to what brought about the result. The Portland Press, a great daily paper in my State, said two days after the election:

The defeat of the constitutional amendment providing for woman suffrage does not come as a surprise to most people. * * * Maine people, as a whole, entirely disapproved of the action of the women agitators for suffrage in Washington. They did not like the methods of campaigning which these women adopted. Especially did they disapprove of the display of banners and placards in front of the White House which conveyed the impression that the people of America were not united in their support of the President when this country was about to embark upon a war. Many a voter in yesterday's election expressed his disapproval of these Washington suffragists by voting against the amendment giving Maine women the right to vote, and had this particular thing in mind when entering the polling place.

Every man that I met on my visit home had only one argument, and this was the argument: "If we approve woman suffrage at this election, it will be an indorsement of the methods of the pickets at Washington, and an invitation for them to continue these disgraceful actions"; and it was sufficient to defeat suffrage in Maine. I wish to insert in my remarks two extracts from the Washington Post bearing upon the opinion of the Nation.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 14, 1917.]

Under more favorable circumstances woman suffrage probably would have carried Maine. The defeat of the suffrage proposal in that State was by a vote of nearly 2 to 1, but the list of supporters of the proposal shows that the most eminent men in the State have been converted to the cause. Not only did President Wilson and Col. Roosevelt advocate the suffrage amendment in Maine, but former Senators Johnson and Gardiner and Gov. Milliken made personal efforts to advance the movement.

Suffrage advocates, as well as those opposed to suffrage, admit frankly that the chief contributing cause to the defeat of suffrage in Maine was the general resentment against the picketing of the White House by the militant suffragettes. The attempt to embarrass the President while the Nation is engaged in war was repudiated by the State suffragists, but it seemed to have no effect on the voters, who apparently made up their minds that if women were to pursue such tactics after they went into politics it would be better to keep them out.

NEW YORK TO REBUKE PICKETS.

"New York will follow Maine in defeating equal suffrage," remarked Mercer Moorman, a physician of New York City, at the Shoreham. "The Empire State, in my judgment, will give a greater majority against suffrage than it did two years ago. Republicans and Democrats alike put the blame for this situation on the suffragists themselves, particularly upon those that have been picketing the White House. The opinion seems to be almost universal in New York that the White House pickets have blocked equal suffrage in the State for from 5 to 10 years.

"Woman suffrage, of course, is coming in New York, as everywhere else in the country, and, in my opinion, there is no good reason why the ballot should not be given to women when the majority of them want it, but the sentiment in New York among political leaders is that men who vote are determined to rebuke the women responsible for the Washington disgrace by voting down the constitutional amendment."

Mr. HERSEY. I am, and always have been, a most earnest, ardent, and enthusiastic advocate of woman suffrage. I am to-day, and I always expect to be. Since I came to Washington last March I have, during the sessions of this House, twice a day in going between my home and the Capitol passed the pickets at the White House gates. I have watched those women standing there at their post of duty, with their banners day after day, in storm and rain, and under the hot southern sun, standing with firm-set lips, with the courage of Joan of Arc, holding their banners at the east and west gates.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. I can not.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he had made that speech before the election in the State of Maine?

Mr. HERSEY. I refuse to yield.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The question is a simple one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. HERSEY. I have for those women the utmost respect. I know their character, which is the best. I know their motives, which are the highest. They believe sincerely that by making themselves martyrs, by going to prison, they can forward the cause of woman in this Nation; but I do not forget that in this Nation and here in this Capital we have given a home to the President, and that the White House is just as sacred to him as my home in this city is to me; the White House is his castle for the time being, and no one has a right to picket the gates of the White House any more than they have the right to picket my home or yours. If for an argument for suffrage anyone has a right to picket the White House, they have a right to picket the home of every Member of this Congress, and the home of every man who is for suffrage could be picketed by the antis, and there would be a picket at the home of every Member of this House. Gentlemen, there are two statues in this city which I wish to call to your attention. One is a statue, a living one, at the White House gate, standing erect, brave and courageous, with a banner on which is inscribed "Kaiser Wilson." It is repelling the votes of men in this Nation for suffrage.

There is another statue attracting the votes of men. That is a statue in the Halls of this Capitol where the men of Illinois have honored their State and themselves by placing there the magnificent statue of Frances Willard, who spent her life in the cause of woman suffrage. Down at the White House there is the inscription on a banner "Kaiser Wilson," the greatest insult that could be offered to an American citizen. There on the statue from Illinois in this Capitol, inscribed on the pedestal, are the last words of Frances Willard, uttered when a thousand men hung on her lips. Let me read it to you:

Oh, it is women who have given the costliest hostages to fortune. Into the battle of life they have sent their best beloved with fearful odds against them. Oh, by the dangers they have dared, by the hours of patient watching over beds where helpless children lay, by the incense of 10,000 prayers wafted from their gentle lips to heaven, I charge you, give them power to protect along life's treacherous highway those whom they have so loved.

The pickets at the White House gate build up a wall against the progress of woman's suffrage, but the gentle influence of Frances Willard will beat it down.

This is not the death of woman suffrage, it will triumph in days to come; but the men of this Nation will never be won to woman's cause by the hatchet of Carrie Nation, the bricks of the English militant, or the pickets with "Kaiser Wilson" banners at the White House gates.

To-day a few misguided fanatical women—

With hands unwise
Close all the gates to Paradise.

To-morrow woman, free, unfettered, and enfranchised, will pass in triumph through those gates and enter into her rightful kingdom, there to go no more out forever. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair state the time remaining to each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts 40 minutes.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. DALE].

Mr. DALE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I most cordially agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who has in his very clear style impressed upon this committee the necessity of raising revenue to prosecute this war even though there are objections from some sources.

I have asked the House to indulge me for just a few minutes in touching upon a phase of this great warfare that has been brought very keenly to our attention during the past few days.

That is the attack upon the American base hospitals, in which the first among our forces in France have been killed—four men killed, four others seriously wounded and maimed for life, and five others moderately wounded.

Mr. Chairman, this organization in which they were serving represents the most effective effort of humanity to lessen the horror of war. It is a branch of the military establishment based on the broadest sense of compassion in these recent times. To its insignia no human heart has ever responded in hate. Under the banners of battling foes its international flag had passed on the pledge of civilized nations that the red cross in the white field must not be rent by shot or shell. Any belligerent who at this time attacks that system not only ignores the common ethics of war but violates the rules of a fair fight, strikes below the belt, and becomes contemptible. [Applause.]

Why, gentlemen, this organization was established by 12 great European nations. At its creation its articles were signed by Prussia and later Germany pledged its faith to it. The first liberal donor was that beneficent woman, still living, at thought of whom one seems to hear a pure tone among all these sweet bells jangled out of tune—Louise of Baden, daughter of Wilhelm I, once King of Prussia and Emperor of Germany.

In the Franco-Prussian War the first blood that flowed from German soldiers was staunchly by Red Cross nurses, and over all the magnificent castles of the grand duchess, turned by her into hospitals, floated with the scarlet and gold of Baden the red and white of that great international society. To these fields and hospitals, to help care for these soldiers as the patron of the grand duchess, went that incomparable American woman, Clara Barton. [Applause.] In 1887, when Miss Barton went again to Germany as president of the American Red Cross and as the appointed delegate of the United States to the International Red Cross Convention at Karlsruhe, she was received by the aged Emperor with the assurance that Germany welcomed all those who were engaged in the great work of humanity.

These are some of the reasons—and I have time to mention only a few—why the Red Cross had a particular confidence in the protection of the German Government, a confidence akin to that which a faithful child bears toward its natural parent. The ruin of that confidence was an insane price to pay for a little wider spread of frightfulness. And there is a deep significance in the fact that the first to die among our troops in France fell under the emblem that the assailing foe was pledged by international covenant to pass unharmed. It is because of acts like this, because of the violation of all international covenants by the Imperial Government many times repeated, on sea and land, that she has lost the one-time deep friendliness of this Government toward her. That is a reason why we are in this war, and it is a madman's price for any nation to pay for a little wider spread of frightfulness.

It has been proclaimed that we have no enmity toward the German people. That is true respecting them in common with all peoples of the earth. But by its conduct of affairs a nation makes a character, a personality, and by that created essence takes its place in civilization. From its once high and honorable estate, by its own infamous use of strength and very culture, Germany has sunk herself in the ranks of humanity till the kindest word that may be spoken of her is pity. The glory inherited from the past this generation has flung away and left but odium for its children. It surrendered to frightfulness at the price of reason, and thereafter hideous madness drove it on. Because of this, the one place at which cruelty paused before agony and the majesty of war perceived in helplessness a right divine has been defiled, and the red cross, emblem of the immortal soul in the white field of civilization, once the mark of immunity, is now the target for assault, and for the safety of those whom it would protect it must be blotted from the sight of the nameless ingnominy that spies upon it.

Does there exist somewhere a notion that brave men and women will fail in their devotion to stricken soldiers because the emblem of their service is no longer a shield from infamy? I saw a few weeks since a complete refutation of that in the determined faces of a contingent of young men leaving our shores for one of these very hospitals that have recently been attacked. There was no demonstration; there was no excitement. The gates to the piers were closed and guarded as the boat that brought them down the river quietly docked, and those strong, courageous, scholarly fellows, substantially all university men, marched silently up one pier and down the next to the boat on which they were to cross the sea. They understood that submarines waited for them in the ocean, that certain peril menaced the place to which they were going. They realized that they were going to trying, sickening scenes on the field and in the hospital, and they sensed the fact that some among their number were marked for death in the humane service on which they were bound. But they went of their own volition, and there was no doubt in their decision or their loyalty. No dastardly act of frightfulness can check that spirit in American manhood. [Applause.] It was no place for us who had no part in the service upon which they had already entered, and who were there, a few of us, because our own boys were in that contingent, and so we came away.

And now, Mr. Chairman, the first among our forces to die in France have been killed in these hospital units, and the manner of their killing, the atrocity with which they were assailed, ought to stir this Nation to a keener sense of its responsibility. It may be that with less patience will be endured this flabby talk of an immature peace. It is possible that the act and word that are a positive peril to our soldiers and a menace to our Government will become intolerable. This act of depravity, without element of justice or quality of mercy, brings home to us the duty we can not avoid. There is but one course for this Nation to pursue now. There is only one way open to it. It must help teach the world that no institution that would enforce its own will by repudiation of all maritime laws and international rights and equitable treaties and solemn covenants and humane customs—that no such institution has a place in this state of civilization. [Applause.] You can not accomplish that if you allow frightfulness to win peace. Do not place on German madness the victor's laurel. A peace imposed by Berlin would be the crowning horror of this ghastly war. These young men have died to help save civilization and to move it a little further forward. It is for us to make sure the cause in which they enlisted. We can have no more holy desire now than the welfare of future generations, and—

We fail
Our oaths if we forsake
To-morrow.

[Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS, THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER, LEADER, AND NEWS.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the annual urgent deficiency bill, which we are now considering, has carried a Post Office deficiency during the years 1885 to 1916, inclusive, in every single year but four of that period. That is my reason for asking the indulgence of the House for the consideration of the question of the 1 cent a pound rate on second-class mail, which is now under consideration by the conferees of the House and the Senate on the revenue bill, and the total amount of these annual post-office deficiency appropriations during the period aforesaid, from 1885 to 1916, inclusive, is $219,721,129.71.

Since March 4, 1885, newspapers and periodicals have been carried, for the publishers, to all parts of the United States at the present second-class postage rate of 1 cent per pound, and newspapers have been delivered free in the county in which they are published, except to offices having free-delivery service. This has been done by the Government at a cost to the people of the United States of more than twelve hundred million dollars, most of which has been paid by those who send letter mail; every time you lick a 2-cent postage stamp and attach it to a letter you contribute 1 cent toward the payment of this subsidy.

The distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, Judge Moon, of Tennessee, has justly denounced this scandalous subsidy on the floor of the House as a "loathsome, larcenous graft," and Chairman KIRCHIN, of the Ways and Means Committee, fully and completely exposed the scandalous iniquity of this legalized subsidy in his recent speech in support of the war-revenue bill. Like every other Government subsidy, this graft has grown enormously by "what it feeds upon."

For five years beginning June 30, 1911, and ending June 30, 1916, the actual loss to the Government in handling and transporting second-class mail, over and above what it received from the newspapers and magazines, is estimated by the Post Office Department to have been $399,713,007, or an average of almost $80,000,000 per year, and the figures show that the annual loss is now increasing at a rate of about $7,000,000 per year. The bulk of this subsidy, now amounting for the year ending June 30, 1916, to $88,060,794, goes to a comparatively few newspaper and magazine corporations, which have an extensive circulation throughout the country. The cost of handling and transporting all second-class mail matter is estimated by the latest official investigation and report of the Post Office Department to be 8.27 cents per pound, so that for every dollar the Government collects for this service it pays out $8.27.

The loss in handling and transporting newspapers is somewhat less than magazines, although newspapers are transported to points in the county of their publication free of cost; but the average longer haul of magazines and their greater bulk, most of which is advertising matter, results in a greater loss to the Government.

The latest available official figures upon the cost to the Government of transporting and handling newspapers were furnished by the commission on second-class mail matter, composed of Charles E. Hughes, A. Lawrence Lowell, and Harry A. Wheeler, appointed by President Taft pursuant to an act of Congress approved March 4, 1911. This commission in its report dated February 22, 1912, approved and adopted the estimated cost to the Government made by the Post Office Department of 6.91 cents per pound for handling and transporting daily newspapers.

For the purpose of determining the extent of the financial interest which the four leading English-language newspapers of Cleveland, Ohio, have in perpetuating this graft I recently directed a letter of inquiry to Gov. Dockery, Third Assistant Postmaster General, requesting him to give me a statement showing the service rendered to each of these newspapers for the past fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and the amount collected by the Government for such service. I am in receipt of a reply to my inquiry, in which he says:

The weights and mailings of the publications referred to by you, and the amount of postage paid thereon during the fiscal year 1917, are given below:

	Weight in pounds of free-in-county mailings.	Weight in pounds of mailings at cent-a-pound rate.	Amount of postage paid.
Cleveland Leader.....	29,414	1,578,463	$15,784.69
Cleveland News.....	6,053	888,903	8,889.03
Cleveland Plain Dealer.....	136,496	2,801,035	28,010.35
Cleveland Press.....	9,937	1,026,347	10,263.47

Computing the cost of this service to the Government at the rate approved by the Hughes Commission, 6.91 cents per pound, we find that the people and the Government of the United States donated for the past year toward the maintenance and support of these four Cleveland newspapers the following-named sums of money over and above what it received from them for services rendered:

Cleveland Leader.....	$95,320.02
Cleveland Press.....	61,343.75
Cleveland News.....	52,952.77
Cleveland Plain Dealer.....	174,973.04

Total loss for the past fiscal year..... 384,589.58

This sum of $384,589.58 is the amount which the Government of the United States actually paid to the railroads and Government employees for handling and transporting by mail these four newspapers in excess of what was paid by them for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and this same rate of postage has been in effect since March 4, 1885.

It is but justice to say that the management of the Cleveland Press has recommended to Congress that the rate of postage on second-class mail be increased to a point which will pay cost of service. The Leader and News have defended this graft in their news and editorial columns, and the Plain Dealer has done the same thing; and during the present session of Congress Elbert H. Baker, president, general manager, and principal owner of the Plain Dealer, has been in Washington lobbying to perpetuate this scandalous and conscienceless graft, and he and his associate publishers of large newspapers and magazines actually induced the Senate Finance Committee to reduce the very moderate increase imposed by the House revenue bill to one-fourth of a cent per pound.

On August 29 last, upon a call of the roll in Committee of the Whole, the United States Senate, by a vote of 40 to 35, adopted the McKellar amendment to the report of the Finance Committee, which approved the zone system, previously adopted by the House, and fixed the rate in the first three zones, a distance of 300 miles, at 1 cent per pound; in the fourth zone, between 300 and 600 miles, at 2 cents per pound; in the fifth zone, between 600 and 1,000 miles, at 3 cents per pound; in the sixth zone, between 1,000 and 1,400 miles, at 4 cents per pound; in the seventh zone, between 1,400 and 1,800 miles, at 5 cents per pound; and in the eighth zone, more than 1,800 miles, at 6 cents per pound.

The amendment proposed by the Senate Finance Committee would have produced additional revenue of $3,000,000, and the McKellar amendment increased this sum to $12,600,000. On September 10, upon the final passage of the revenue bill in the Senate, the McKellar amendment was defeated upon a roll call by a vote of 34 to 40.

As this bill passed the House it left unchanged the present law authorizing free delivery in the county of publication, where free carrier service is not provided, and the present rate where carrier service is furnished free. It then provides for the application of the zone system now provided for parcel post to second-class mail and fixes gradually increasing rates which, on March 1, 1918, will be 1½ cents per pound, or fraction thereof, for delivery within the first zone; 2 cents per pound, or fraction thereof, for delivery within the second and third zones; 3 cents per pound, or fraction thereof, for delivery within the fourth and fifth zones; 4 cents per pound, or fraction thereof, for delivery within the sixth zone; 5 cents per pound, or fraction thereof, for delivery within the seventh zone; and 6 cents per pound, or fraction thereof, for delivery within the eighth zone.

These rates proposed in the House bill, if enacted into law, will, when fully effective, produce a revenue of about $19,000,000 more than that derived from the present law of 1 cent per pound on second-class mail, and yet it will only pay about one-third of the cost to the Government for handling and transporting the same. Other patrons of the Postal Service will still be required to contribute two dollars for every dollar paid by the newspapers and periodicals, who have the exclusive benefit of this service. The present cost to the Government of handling and transporting second-class mail matter is about $100,000,000 per annum, and for this service at 1 cent per pound the sum of about $11,000,000 is collected, leaving an annual deficit to be made up from first-class mail and by "deficiency appropriations" of about $89,000,000 per year.

Much can be said in support of the contention that publishers, having had the benefit of this 1 cent rate for more than 32 years, their business has been adjusted and arranged in conformity to it, and to impose cost of service at once would result in a violent wrench to the business of many publishing houses, and might result in bankruptcy and ruin to a few of them. As a practical proposition, it also may be fairly said that an act imposing a rate which would require newspapers and magazines to pay the cost of transporting and handling their product would be defeated, and therefore this moderate increase can be defended at this time upon the theory that "one-third of a loaf is better than no bread."

This is a humiliating confession for a Member of Congress to make, but candor compels the admission, and the political history of this Nation for the past 32 years establishes beyond controversy the fact, that by enacting this legislation, imposing upon the Government the burden of handling and transporting magazines and newspapers at less than one-eighth of the actual cost, Congress has built up a political Frankenstein which now threatens to ruin and destroy those Members of Congress who dare to vote to reduce their Government subsidy by even a fraction of one-fourth. Since the House voted last spring to impose this slight increase in second-class postal rates there has been a cold-blooded, deliberate, and concerted effort on the part of those newspapers and magazines which still refuse to consent to the reduction in any degree of the graft they have so long enjoyed at the expense of their fellow citizens, to vilify, malign, and defame and thereby to discredit and disgrace those Members of Congress who voted for this moderate increase.

It is the old, old cry of Demetrius, the silversmith, who defended the sanctity of the heathen temples for which he made shrines and idols, when he said, "Sirs, know ye not that by this craft we have our wealth?" The three Cleveland newspapers which are supporting and defending this graft have, through the operation of the law, forced their fellow citizens to contribute to their profits since 1909, as shown by the official records in the Post Office Department, and down to and including 1917, the following sums: For the period of nine years ending June 30, 1917, the three Cleveland daily newspapers, which are defending the present second-class postage rate of 1 cent per pound and defaming and traducing those Members of Congress who voted to increase it from one-sixth to one-third of the cost of service, sent the number of pounds of their papers through the mails hereafter specified, to wit:

The Cleveland News sent through the mails under the privilege of the free-in-county mailings 99,186 pounds, for which it paid nothing, and 7,618,966 pounds for which it paid 1 cent per pound, or $76,189.66. If the News had paid what this service cost the Government during these nine years, it would have paid $533,324.30; so that the net loss to the Government on the service furnished the Cleveland News was $457,134.64, or an average loss of $50,792.74 per year.

The Cleveland Leader sent through the mails during this period of nine years, under the privilege of free-in-county mailings, 257,621 pounds, for which it paid nothing, and 13,007,360 pounds for which it paid 1 cent per pound. If the Leader had paid what this service cost the Government, it would have paid during this period of nine years $916,610.18; so that the net loss to the Government on the service furnished the Cleveland Leader was $786,536.58, or an average loss of $87,393.95 per year.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer sent through the mails during this period of nine years ending June 30, 1917, under the privilege of free-in-county mailings, 1,018,164 pounds, for which it paid nothing, and 20,327,647 pounds for which it paid 1 cent per pound. If the Plain Dealer had paid the Government what this service cost, it would have paid $1,474,995.54 during the period of nine years; so that the net loss to the Government on this service furnished the Plain Dealer was $1,271,719.07, or an average loss of $141,302.12 per year.

The Plain Dealer Publishing Co., a corporation, owns and publishes the Plain Dealer, and the Leader-News Co., a corporation, owns and publishes the Leader and the News. These two corporations are "organized for profit," and as "corporations have no souls" it is not surprising that their news and editorial columns should be used to defend this graft, which in nine years has added to the net profits of the Leader-News Co. $1,243,671.22, or more than $138,000 per year, and to the profits of the Plain Dealer Publishing Co. $1,271,719.07, or more than $141,000 per year, at the expense of the Government and the people of the United States.

The Leader and the News were originally purchased by one of the largest owners of stock in the Cleveland street car lines for the purpose of conserving the value of that investment by extolling the beauties of 5-cent street car fare to the people of Cleveland, and to that end these newspapers vilified, maligned, and abused every public official and citizen of Cleveland who refused to vote for legislation that would increase the value of this street railway stock. The people of Cleveland understood the motives actuating these newspapers, however, and continued to elect Tom L. Johnson mayor and a council to support him, until the fare was finally reduced to 3 cents as a result of his efforts, which is the present existing rate in spite of the Leader and the News, thereby leaving to date $25,000,000 in the pockets of the Cleveland car riders which would have otherwise been paid as dividends on the watered stock of this street car corporation. The stock in the Leader-News Newspaper Corporation descended, along with the street railway stock, under the Ohio statutes of descent and distribution, to the present owner, and they have been run "true to form" to date. They continued their malignant abuse of Tom L. Johnson until after he was dead and in his grave.

As a matter of fact, the attitude of the Cleveland Leader and News, under their present management, toward public men and measures, is precisely the same as that of the butchers' dogs, that feed upon the garbage and fatten upon the offal of the shambles; they are always ready to howl and bark and growl, and snarl and snap at whoever approaches, interferes with, or threatens the profits of their master's trade or business; and as the owner of the stock in the Leader and News also owns stock in the street car and other corporations, these newspapers are kept very busy promoting these different interests through their columns.

The Plain Dealer, not having a direct financial interest to do otherwise, has usually taken the side of the public upon public questions, although during a critical period of the street-railway fight, it opposed Mr. Johnson and seemed to be doing all in its power to deprive the public of all it had gained by years of warfare, but this was doubtless due to ignorance, the Tory lawyers for the street car company no doubt having convinced Mr. Baker, president of the Plain Dealer Co. that they were working in the public interests instead of for the street-car corporation, which had employed and was paying them.

The court records of Cleveland disclose fights between the circulating managers of these two newspaper corporations which would bring disgrace upon any civilized community; newsboys 10 and 12 years of age have been beaten into insensibility and permanently injured because they refused to be driven off the streets by the thugs, plug-uglies, and gunmen employed and paid for this sort of work for the purpose of reducing the circulation of the rival publication and increasing that of the newspaper which employed them. At least one death has been directly caused by these assaults. The Plain Dealer management contend, and the testimony seems to support their contention, that the Leader-News Co. first resorted to this strong-arm method of "stimulating" the circulation of the Leader and News and reducing that of its rival, but that these criminal methods have been used by agents of both these corporations is beyond dispute.

This method of "molding" public opinion is certainly not a part of the authority conferred by their charters on either of these corporations, but it is only a few degrees more disgraceful than the willful, deliberate, and malicious misrepresentation and assassination of character and reputation to which they have resorted for the purpose of controlling the official action of the Representatives in Congress from Cleveland, failing in which, the same methods have been used to discredit and disgrace two of them in the eyes of their constituents. These newspapers are conspicuous examples of those "organs of public opinion" throughout the country which, since the declaration of a state of war with Germany, have charged Members of Congress who do not vote and talk on public questions in accordance with orders from the newspapers with attempting to aid Germany in this war and with disloyalty to the United States. That wise old philosopher, Dr. Samuel Johnson, gave utterance to a great and profound truth when he said, "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel," and the Leader-News and Plain Dealer appear from their columns to have in their service an undue proportion of this class of "patriots" to whom Dr. Johnson referred. Prussian and all other arbitrary governments and officials, as well as some newspapers, in time of war, call every man a traitor who refuses to be a slave.

The representatives of the newspaper publishing associations have recently been conferring upon the questions of the methods which the Government should adopt to float the next bond issue to raise money to carry on the war. They unanimously decided that the newspapers should be paid $3,000,000 out of the Public Treasury as compensation for advertising the coming bond issue.

Every man in public life naturally desires to avoid a course of official conduct which is likely to incur the enmity of so powerful a force in creating public opinion as the newspapers and magazines, and to this fact is undoubtedly due the longevity of this stupendous graft upon the public revenues, resulting from handling, carrying, and delivering second-class mail at 1 cent per pound. Every Postmaster General for about 25 years has thundered against it and pointed out its injustice in his annual reports; at least six commissions appointed to investigate the subject have done the same thing without inducing action by Congress, and the constantly growing iniquity of the graft has been so fully exposed by the debates in the present Congress that failure to substantially increase this rate now will be ascribed to personal dishonesty on the part of a majority of the Members of the House and Senate.

As a direct result of the subsidy provided by this rate of 1 cent a pound, and due solely to its operation as an incentive, there has been an enormous increase in the production and distribution of cheap magazines and newspapers, most of which increase may be fairly denominated "trash," and there has been a corresponding decrease during the same period in this country of valuable literature, especially of good books. There are to-day more magazines and newspapers published in the United States than in all the rest of the world combined, and the production of books has steadily declined during this period until we produce fewer good books annually in proportion to the population than any other civilized country except Spain. This scandalous and iniquitous graft and subsidy has debauched the literature of the Nation, has debased the literary taste of its people, and has driven out of business thousands of book stores, the beacon lights of truth and of mental and moral progress in the communities in which they exist.

If this Congress does not take a substantial step forward in the direction of abolishing this larcenous graft and subsidy, it will earn and deserve the contempt of every decent American citizen. In this great crisis of our country's history, when the Nation is at war and resorting to nearly every source of taxation available, is no time to continue this legalized steal for the benefit of a few publishing houses, and the House should adhere to the action previously taken and support its conferees. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reflect briefly the sentiment of my State in respect to the revenue bill, which will be back to us now within the next few days.

Mr. GILLETT. Few weeks.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Not that long, I hope. I have a letter to-day from a very thoughtful gentleman who lives in the northern portion of my district, and who has made it his business to interview a very large number of people going through his town by rail and otherwise upon this subject.

It is difficult for us here at the Capital to understand how thoroughly aroused the people of the West are upon the subject of taxation of war profits and incomes. The letter referred to, from Mr. Matt Johnson, of Omeme, N. Dak., will give a good idea of what is in the minds of the overwhelming majority of the people. I believe we in the House should take a decided stand for a genuine conscription of wealth, not the make-believe passed by the Senate. Mr. Johnson says:

OMEMEE, N. DAK., September 12, 1917.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND YOUNG: It is with some diffidence that I write this letter to you. Although I have always taken a deep interest in public affairs in the lesser spheres, I have never ventured writing to a Congressman or Senator on matters concerning national affairs; but I feel, Mr. YOUNG, that there are elements in the present situation which will serve to vindicate me from the charge of being too presumptuous.

The immediate cause of my writing is the Senate vote on excess profits. I want to tell you that the Twin City dailies and every daily in North Dakota, with possibly one exception, misrepresents the situation and the sentiment in this State. Two or three war fans in every town can do more to misrepresent the real sentiments than even the daily papers. The feeling in North Dakota is nearly all one way. The feeling is that La Follette, Johnson, Borah, and Kenyon were, if anything, too conservative. I have made it my business to talk with people concerning this matter. I live in a cross-roads town, where quite a few people every day switch from one road to the other. The sentiment expressed is always the same; that is, that excess war profits should be taken. No amount of oratory can ever convince the people that 80 per cent of excess war profits is unjust. And it is surprising how much attention they give to the question. They know what happened during and after the Civil War. Personally, I know that my father served in the Civil War for $13 per month but was paid in shinplaster money worth about $7. Then when the war was over he came home and for 25 years he helped to pay the war debt every time he bought matches, tobacco, etc. Every other soldier did the same thing. But houses like Gould and Vanderbilt profited enormously. It seems that the same thing is about to happen, only on a still more disgraceful scale. A 31 per cent excess tax will be looked upon as a joke—a serious one, but a joke nevertheless.

I believe I know something about the situation in North Dakota. Now, Mr. YOUNG, I am not an alarmist. I am not a Socialist, nor an anarchist. But my honest opinion is that out here we are sitting on a volcano. The surface indications are not so bad, but the undercurrent is alarming. The people here can't see why they should be blindly patriotic when the people of the East and South are so mercenary and methodical. No amount of newspaper talk or oratory will convince them; congressional action will.

I hope that this letter will be taken in the spirit in which it is written and sent.

With best wishes and kindest regards, I am,
Yours, truly,

MATT JOHNSON.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in these days, when persons who do not know the exact situation are making charges that great grafts have been taking place with respect to the construction of cantonments, I think it will be refreshing to the membership of the House to know that all of the 16 general cantonments for the National Army, now at the point of completion, have come under the War Department's estimate of cost per man, and the American Lake cantonment leads them all in lowness of cost and time of completion.

Mr. Chairman, I would not refer to these charges at all were it not for the fact that they were brought up yesterday on this floor during the discussion of the deficiency bill now pending. The public, of course, deserves information. The public has a right to know all about these cantonments—these 16 new cities where our great National Army is to receive the best training ever given to any army in all the world.

The district which I have the honor to represent, Mr. Chairman, was honored by having placed within its confines—adjoining the beautiful city of Tacoma and under the shadow of the greatest and most inspiring mountain on the continent—a cantonment. It is called Camp Lewis, and is at American Lake, a site which for 20 years past has been recommended as an assembly place, a parade place, and a training place for the American Army—recommended by Gen. Funston, Gen. Bell, former President Taft when he was Secretary of War, former President Roosevelt, and dozens of others. It is the ideal spot; healthful, beautiful, and without a single objectionable feature.

This cantonment, Mr. Chairman, has been constructed at the lowest cost of them all. It is ready first. When the War Department called for the construction of these places—each to hold from 40,000 to 50,000 soldiers, to say nothing of thousands of men outside of the Army but necessary to its existence—the Army officials thought three things would count. These were:

Time of construction.

Quality of work.

Cost of construction.

In writing I pledged Col. Littell, constructing quartermaster in charge of all the work, that Tacoma and Pierce County would excel in all three.

Why did I feel so sure?

Because, Mr. Chairman, the people of Tacoma and Pierce County had performed a great patriotic act when, last fall, feeling that the war was inevitable, they bonded themselves in the sum of $2,000,000 to finish the purchase of the American Lake tract of land, nearly 15 miles square, and made a present of that land to the United States Government for cantonment purposes. [Applause.]

That was patriotism, and it was patriotism combined with efficiency of the highest order, that set that cantonment up, complete, at the lowest cost per capita of all the cantonments.

The fact that the land was given without price and without rental or the least charge was not considered in estimating these costs.

Efficiency prevailed all along the line from Charles B. Hurley and his construction company on down to the last man who helped with the work. In the Army, too, proficiency was shown in every step taken by the great construction division created to meet an emergency to work out an unprecedented problem—that of housing within 70 days an Army of more than a million and a half of men. It took a great deal of help and generous cooperation on the part of all citizens. Everything was needed, and needed quickly. For instance, when the first contingent of engineer officers arrived they went to a manufacturer of mattresses in the city of Tacoma and asked him, "How many mattresses can you furnish at once?" He said, "I can furnish 2,000." "Well," they said, "We'll take them, but we want 10,000 more immediately. How soon can we have them?" He said, "In two weeks."

And so on through the entire line of construction of that cantonment. The people went as far as they could to assist in the preparation. About 30 miles of sewer pipe had to be purchased and laid, some of it as deep as 13 feet. More than 270 miles of electric-light wiring was strung, 30,000 drop-lights installed, and 300 large street lamps. Electric current is furnished by the Tacoma city government at about 1½ cents per kilowatt hour—probably as low a price as anywhere in the United States. Something more than 10,000 civilian workmen were employed and were fed on the grounds by the contractor's civilian quartermaster, whose work was such that an effort is being made to enroll him in the Army service in that capacity.

A fund is being raised to provide for the flying over Camp Lewis of the largest American flag that can be bought, from the tallest flagstaff in the world. And why not? That's the way they do things out there!

But, Mr. Chairman, if it took a quick organization of civilians to get the American Lake cantonment ready, then it took sixteen times as much to get the constructing quartermaster's organization going for 16 such cantonments.

In the preparation of the American Lake cantonment I had quite naturally to be of some service at this end of the line, and my work placed me in contact with Col. I. W. Littell, the chief officer in charge; with Maj. Preston Brown, in charge of information; with Capt. R. C. Marshall, assistant to Col. Littell; with Maj. Evan Shelby, legal adviser; with Maj. A. W. Starrett, of the construction committee; with Maj. Gunby, chief of the engineering branch; and Maj. Wheaton, chief of architectural construction and design. In this connection I may say that it is hoped to make the Tacoma cantonment the most beautiful of them all, in keeping with nature's surroundings in that God-favored country, and I hope that Congress will make at once an appropriation which will provide for the painting of the buildings. I also gained the acquaintance of Maj. R. E. Hamilton and his assistants, in charge of materials, and numerous other Army officers in charge of the buying of wood, cement, and iron pipe, of ranges, stoves, lumber, screens, hardware, electrical supplies, transportation, and, in fact, all of the things that go to build almost overnight a fully equipped, sanitary, and comfortable city of 50,000 souls.

One can hardly imagine a more efficient organization than Col. Littell gathered under him. Do not take my word for it. Read his statements strung along in the hearings on this bill all the way from page 374 to page 910 in a book of about 1,000 pages. Notice his keen insight and firm hold of the situation, and then perhaps grumblings will cease. Of course it cost money to build these cantonments, and lots of it. Labor was well paid, but materials were close bought, and the 10 per cent contracts were a myth. They did not exist. Even those contractors who started on a 10 per cent profit basis on some of the smaller constructions—like officers' temporary quarters at Fort Myer, for instance—were signed up to accept the official "contract for emergency work," and under that contract this much-heralded 10 per cent fell to as low as 3 per cent.

The American Lake cantonment was built on an unset price, out of which the contractor paid all of his overhead and many other charges, including the keeping of a well-known and highly efficient State of Washington man—Mr. George B. Kittinger—here to look after details, expedite the procuring of materials, and the like.

With prices as they are these days at the leading Washington, D. C., hotels, it costs money to stop long in this town, and if I felt like complaining about extortion and robbery I most certainly should direct it at these hotels in the National Capital rather than at any price paid for either material or labor in these great cantonments. [Applause.]

I have not seen the great Tacoma cantonment or any other, and I am anxiously awaiting the time when I can visit my district, see what has been accomplished at American Lake, and get in close communion with the real and true patriotism which prevails in western Washington, and, in fact, throughout all the State of Washington, in spite of a small number of treasonable outbursts on the part of a few. While there has been some little feeling and some outbursts on the part of some who should be good citizens, aided and abetted by agitators who, unfortunately, are Americans, but who are not working for the interests of this Government, I am convinced that a true patriotic spirit prevails throughout the body of the State of Washington. Our people know why we are at war, and they know that we must and shall win. Our State of Washington young men are in every branch of the Army and Navy service in great numbers. Our people are accepting the draft in the true spirit and have come to understand it thoroughly as an equitable way of quickly providing a great army. In short, our people are for the Government. Minor problems can wait until the war is won.

In conclusion may I be permitted to assure the Congress and the people generally that all of the men in the National Army who have been sent to this American Lake cantonment—and that will include men of the National Army selected in all the Northwestern States and Alaska—will find themselves during this fall and winter and spring, and perhaps part of next summer, in the most delightful and equable climate in all the United States, and surrounded by a loyal, patriotic, and upright citizenry and good moral conditions?

Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few observations upon this bill and some other questions, but the time allotted being so brief I am going to ask permission to extend my remarks in the Record. However, I want to say this, that I think I reflect the sentiment of the people of my State when I say that I shall personally vote for this bill, and I shall vote for any other bill appropriating any amount of money necessary to carry this war to a successful termination.

The amount of money carried by this bill surpasses any appropriation ever made by any government in the history of the world, and while we are all ready and willing to vote for it because we think it is needed, I think it will not be charged that it is an extravagant appropriation but the expenditure made to meet the necessities of the Government in times of great stress. The question that is interesting the people of the country is not so much what the appropriation amounts to as how the money thus appropriated is to be obtained, and the brief remarks that I have to submit might better apply to the revenue bill than the appropriation bill.

The estimates submitted by the departments for this bill aggregate more than $7,000,000,000, and this bill carries approximately five and a half billion dollars. It is estimated that when the revenue bill now in conference becomes a law and raises by taxation a sum many times greater than was ever raised by this Government by a system of taxation that there will still be a deficit of at least $2,000,000,000. It is, therefore, manifest that the question of taxation must engage the profoundest thought of the profoundest students of the country. No system of taxation can be exactly just. The burden is bound to be unequal. The taxation should, however, be laid with a keen appreciation not alone by what it takes from a man, but also by what it leaves a man. In times like this everybody must contribute, and, so far as possible, they should contribute in proportion to their capacity to pay.

One of the questions that is interesting the people of the country is what proportion of this immense burden is to be borne by taxation and what proportion by a bond issue. If the President is correct, and we believe he is, that this war is fought to make the world safe for democracy, then it appeals to me that a larger per cent of this burden should be borne by those who come after us than many of my colleagues are willing to admit. As near as I can ascertain, England, who has now been engaged in the war for three years and has expended about $20,000,000,000, has raised about one-fourth of that amount by taxation and financed the other three-fourths by a system of bonding. Many of you believe that we should meet 50 per cent of the expense of the war by taxation. In that I do not agree. We are furnishing the men—the young men of to-day will shed the blood to carry this war to a successful termination—and it appeals to me that a large portion of the money should be paid by those who come after us.

It is reported in financial journals, and maintained by financiers of the world, that the credit of England is to-day as stable as it was when war began, and that her huge bonding system has not in the slightest degree affected her credit. If that be correct, then surely this Government can afford to bond at least upon the ratio equal to that of Great Britain. If too great a part of the cost of this war should be laid upon the people by a system of taxation it would absorb the whole potential savings of the present day. So long as it lasts all internal and domestic improvements and progress would cease, not a mile of railway would be built, not another mill or factory would be erected except those engaged in the production of war munitions. No man would improve his farm; streets and roads would no longer be developed; and if the war should last a number of years absolute stagnation would prevail at home. This is one of the great questions that must be met and mastered in financing this war. To me it is exceedingly doubtful if any system of taxation could be devised which would provide revenue sufficient to pay even one-half of the cost of this war during its progress. My personal conviction is that not to exceed one-fourth of the money should be raised by taxation, and that tax should be so laid that every man and woman in the United States should know and realize that it is being paid for war purposes and that they are doing their bit and bearing their just share of the burden. How to lay such a tax is the great problem confronting us.

At the risk of being considered radical, it is my judgment that at least 75 per cent of the excess profits of every man should be taken, and that at least 50 per cent of the income should be taken. The country has everything at stake. Millions of men, both rich and poor, will bare their breasts to bullets and bloody bayonets on European soil. Many of them will give their lives—their all—and those who remain at home should be willing to give a large part of their annual income. Of course there comes a point in the lives of many people at which little or nothing can be done because they have but little or nothing to give in the way of financial support. But when a man has been left the reasonable necessities of life he should in such an emergency as this be willing to contribute a considerable part of any excess of the reasonable necessities. This, I know, in quarters will be denominated as conscription of wealth. Well, let them call it what they will. In my judgment it is necessary to win the war, and in times like this everything and anything that is necessary should and will be done.

Income taxation must, under the present war conditions, constitute the principal source of revenue, and the rates should of necessity be progressive. They should not absorb all the savings of any class, but they should increase and be made to apply in proportion to the ability of the individual to pay. No man should be allowed to make a dollar out of this war, and if he is engaged in business of furnishing supplies, materials, or manufacturing articles for the Government, everything in excess of what his normal profits would be if we were not engaged in war should be taken by the Government to replenish the Treasury for this great struggle.

At this point, Mr. President, permit me to digress briefly to say that there is another bill pending in this House of vast importance to the American people. I refer to several bills introduced with the view of compelling aliens in our country to be brought within the provisions of the draft. I have not figures of the whole country, but the State of Montana is called upon under the draft law to furnish about 10,000 men, and the registration shows that there are about 12,000 aliens of draft age in the State of Montana who will be exempt. And our people can not reconcile themselves to the belief that it is right and just that our American-born boys should go to the trenches of Europe while these aliens remain at home and take the jobs as soon as our boys are drafted into the Army. Most of these aliens are citizens of our allies and owe allegiance to some flag and some country. They enjoy the benefits of our flag. They doubtless came here in the hope of bettering their conditions. If our country and their country is now engaged in a struggle for existence, they should be called upon to bear their share of that burden. Draft laws exist in nearly every country allied with us, but our laws will not permit a foreign Government to come to our shores and draft their citizens. I realize that treaty stipulations and other obstacles stand in the way of including these men within our own draft, but this Government must overcome those obstacles. Either our laws must be changed so that we may draft these aliens, or authority must be given our allies to come here for man power among their citizens. Personally I should go further. I should even include alien enemies in the draft, and when so drafted I should utilize them as noncombatants in doing necessary and productive work on behalf of the Government. On this latter phase, however, I am led to believe our people have not fixed opinions, but on the question of citizens of our allies residing in this country and falling within the draft age, the opinion of the American people is so fixed and certain that for my part I beg to say now that until these men are called upon to bear their just share of the burdens of this world war I shall not cast another vote for the draft of American boys.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

For compensation of the two additional commissioners, authorized by the act approved August 9, 1917, from September 1, 1917, until June 30, 1918, inclusive, at the rate of $10,000 per annum each, $16,666.66.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after line 7, insert as new paragraphs the following:

EMERGENCY SHIPPING FUND.

The cost of purchasing, requisitioning, or otherwise acquiring plants, material, charters, or ships now constructed or in the course of construction and the expediting of construction of ships thus under construction, authorized by the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, is increased from $250,000,000 to $515,000,000, and there is appropriated for this purpose the sum of $200,000,000.

The cost of construction of ships authorized by the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, is increased from $500,000,000 to $1,234,000,000, and there is appropriated for this purpose the sum of $250,000,000.

For the purchase of ships, other than those heretofore or herein authorized, $150,000,000.

For the acquisition or establishment of plants suitable for shipbuilding, or of materials essential thereto, and for the enlargement or extension of such plants as are now or may be hereafter acquired or established, $35,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is to provide the program for the ships to be obtained by the Shipping Board in accordance with the statement made by me yesterday in my remarks upon the bill. These moneys are necessary if the Government is to undertake the program necessary to furnish the ships essential to the national defense. If they are to be furnished, it is imperative that the program be authorized at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the appropriations that are carried in the supplemental amendments offered by the committee provide for a shipping fund that makes, with the prior appropriation of over five hundred millions, a grand total of over $1,700,000,000. The Shipping Board purposes to utilize to the maximum every shipbuilding yard, both public and private, in the country, and to have them operated at their maximum efficiency for the next 24 months. It not only purposes to utilize the existing yards, but it is contemplated to have the Government establish three additional Government yards, which will be utilized for the assembling of fabricated steel in the construction of completed hulls.

The hearings before the committee disclose that the program as outlined by the late manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the renowned, capable, energetic Lieut. Gen. Goethals, has been almost in every particular approved of and carried out by his present successor. The unfortunate squabble that caused the severance of the relations of this great canal builder and constructive engineer from the Government shows, as far as the testimony discloses, that his idea of the necessity of building steel ships, if we were going to have a real merchant marine to carry the increased tonnage and to take the place of the tonnage that is being sunk and will continue to be sunk until the submarine menace is checked, was the proper one.

The new board has virtually abandoned the policy of building wooden ships. It may be fair to say that that is partly due to the inability of securing the necessary lumber. But any mechanical engineer—and he does not have to be an engineer—but any large manufacturer would know that where you are building ships of a certain model, when you once get the model established it is only a question of manufacturing in large numbers the same forms in fabricated steel in order to turn out the necessary hulls that will result in expedition in the building of a large fleet of ships.

Another practical reason that appeals to any business man is that when this war is over and the United States Government will have this immense fleet that it is building for its use in carrying the merchandise of our country the world over, that if we are going to have a practical merchant marine to cope with the conditions then existing, a steel-ship fleet of large tonnage such as is contemplated in the steel ships now building and designed, running from 6,000 up to nearly 10,000 tons displacement, will be much more serviceable than the slow-going and smaller 3,500-ton wooden ships. That has been demonstrated by the evolution of transportation on the Great Lakes.

It was only 25 years ago when the wooden ship was the prevailing character of vessel carrying the wheat and the ore from Lake Superior down the Lakes to Buffalo and returning with cargoes of coal up the Lakes. But that character of ships has given way, first, to the so-called "pig," or steel "whale-back," carrying a great amount of tonnage in the way of ore and wheat, until now we have these large 10,000, 11,000, and 12,000 ton steel ships with a draft of, say, 14 or 16 feet, that have supplanted the old style of wooden ships entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. So it was good business policy for Gen. Goethals, in view of the demand to put on the high seas as quickly as possible as many ships as we could, to utilize small shipyards for the building of wooden ships; but Gen. Goethals was absolutely right in his primal position, that if we are going to cope with the enemy so far as shipping facilities are concerned, and get the greatest output in the shortest time, to have steel ships in greatest number, and not only to have them serviceable during the war but to have an effective means of transportation on the high seas and which would not be mere junk after the war.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. As I understand it, Gen. Goethals's plan comprehended the building of wooden ships to the extent that we had seasoned lumber for them, but that the ships built of raw lumber or sappy lumber would go down quickly when put on the sea. Is that correct?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is correct in that statement.

Mr. REAVIS. And there have been a good many unpleasant rumors in regard to that. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the plan of steel ships as promulgated by Gen. Goethals has now been adopted by the Shipping Board?

Mr. STAFFORD. Virtually by the successor of Gen. Goethals. The program as outlined by Gen. Goethals is being executed substantially by his successor.

Mr. REAVIS. So that those vessels that we will have at the conclusion of this war can be the nucleus, at least, of the merchant marine?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. That is one argument in favor of the Government spending this immense sum of one billion seven hundred million, so that when the war comes to a close—and who can predict when it will come to a close?—although at the present time there is only one policy for the Government to follow, and that is to utilize all its activities at their maximum in order to be prepared for any contingency. I say when that time comes we shall have effective means to carry on our merchant trade the world over.

As I was saying just prior to the gentleman's interruption, these wooden ships at the close of the war and the shipping facilities returned to the normal will be abandoned, because in the cost of operation it costs as much to operate a ship, so far as the overhead charges are concerned—such as the personnel of the officers and a large part of the crew—of a 3,600-ton ship as it does a 9,000-ton ship. That is why on the Great Lakes the ten and twelve thousand ton ships have supplanted the wooden ships that I sailed on 15 or 18 years ago that carried only 3,000 tons. Those old wooden hulks, although serviceable, have been confined to the docks and are tied up there because they could not be operated in competition with ships that have a larger tonnage.

It was a far-seeing policy on the part of Gen. Goethals when he advocated the policy of utilizing all the small shipyards in turning out a limited number of wooden ships, but at the same time recognizing that if we were going to multiply our merchant marine in the coming months to cope with an enemy we would have to adopt the policy of building steel ships, and that is the policy that this enormous program of $1,700,000,000 contemplates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. I approve of this amendment, but I approve of it purely and simply as a war measure. If we were at peace, I would not vote for it. And yet I wish we had a merchant marine—when we get out upon the world's highway and peace comes again—that will carry our products to foreign markets, monopolizing, as we ought to where we can monopolize, the coastwise trade.

If it had not been for that we would have been absolutely helpless, so far as ships and shipyards are concerned. For that reason I do not desire to detain the committee in the consideration of this bill by what I have to say. But you might give to the United States a merchant marine complete, and on the world's highway, where we must compete with the world, we would be driven out of business, unless by grants from the Treasury we made up the difference between the cost of operating ships on the world's highway, under our flag, in competition with the other nations of the world. Hence I wanted to say just that. I am for this bill because I believe it to be necessary, under stress, for the protection of ourselves and our allies that we should have these ships as a war measure. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat I want to ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is not a bill pending before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to open up to the coastwise trade, of which the gentleman spoke, all the ships of the world—a trade which heretofore has been protected for the use of American ships only?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether such a bill is pending or not. If it is pending, I hope it will not be enacted into law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Such a bill is pending, if you will allow me, before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but no action has been had on it.

Mr. CANNON. It has not been reported?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; it has not been reported. It is being considered, but no action has been taken on it.

Mr. CANNON. I hope it has not been favorably reported, and if it should be favorably reported I would like to have about five minutes to talk about it.

Mr. ROBBINS. And against it?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; against it, because, I say again, without our monopolization of the coastwise trade we would be absolutely helpless.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. After the war, if the Government continues with this fleet as a merchant marine, will the coastwise trade be open to the Government ships—these that we are building now?

Mr. CANNON. They will be our ships and sailing under our flag, and, of course, they could engage in the coastwise trade. But if all the world could engage in that coastwise trade we would be put out of business in the coastwise trade, as we will be put out of business on the world's highway when we have to compete with the world unless we make grants from the Treasury to equal the difference between the cost of running our ships and the world's cost of operating its ships.

Mr. FESS. Is there the same danger in the Government becoming a competitor and putting out of business those engaged now in the coastwise trade? Does not that danger exist?

Mr. CANNON. If you open the coastwise trade to all the world, yes. As I am correctly informed, we have so far amended the law that we let ships built by the balance of the world, if owned here and flying our flag, engage in our coastwise trade, but that is all. It might put our shipyards out of business. That is another question. What I wanted to call attention to was the difference in cost of operating the ships.

Mr. FESS. Yes. I appreciate that point.

Mr. CANNON. The difference in the cost of operating our ships on the world's highway and the cost to Japan, Great Britain, Germany, France, and all the balance of the world in operating their ships.

Mr. FESS. My query was leading to this: Is it not possible that the time will come when all the shipping, as far as our country is concerned, will be carried on by the Government, including the coastwise trade? Is not that involved in the step we are taking now?

Mr. CANNON. As to the coastwise trade, we can monopolize that trade, and I do not believe as a permanent policy that the world will be allowed to engage in our coastwise trade.

Mr. FESS. I hope not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not under existing law. Foreign nations can not engage in the coastwise trade now.

Mr. CANNON. I understand; but prior to the amendment, as I recollect it, a ship engaged in the coastwise trade must have been constructed in our shipyards.

But now we can buy ships constructed in the shipyards of Japan to enter our coastwise trade. But that is not so important; because while it might and would put our shipyards out of business, in my judgment, I am calling attention to the larger question, and what will happen when this war is over is that this great fleet that we are creating and must create to prosecute this great war successfully will disappear like the dew in the morning, unless we make grants from the Treasury equal to the difference between the cost to us of operating that fleet and the cost of the world in operating their fleets in competition. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What has been said emphasizes what most of us here recognize, that under the emergency of war we are setting out in legislation that in character is quite different from what it would be if we were in normal times, and much of this legislation doubtless will inevitably be permanent. We are taking steps that we will not retrace. We are taking them under the stress of emergency, and I have no doubt this very amendment supplies one case, where we are building a great number of ships primarily for war purposes, but which will serve as the beginning of a Government merchant marine. Everybody wants to see the ships built, and wants the Government to build them, since private companies can not be secured to do it, and these ships will serve as the beginning of the building of a great merchant marine, which we probably will not modify from the standpoint of governmental activity. And if that merchant marine proves successful—that is, if it proves an economic success, either by subsidy in the way of making up a loss of operation or otherwise—there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that it will be extended as a Government merchant marine to the coastwise trade. In that case, the individual transporting companies now having that monopoly, not able to compete with the Government, because the expense will be entirely different, I have no doubt the time will come when we will have no private transportation along the coast, and that the Government will be doing it all. This will have a great result, not only on the coastwise transportation companies but, in addition, the private shipyards will probably become governmental shipyards. I call attention to that tendency in legislation, which is forced upon us by the stress of war, and have not the slightest doubt that it will become permanent later on. However, that is no reason why we should not vote for the measure when it is necessary, and I shall vote for it. But I do so because there is no choice to us in the face of the impending crisis.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

The appropriation provided by section 7 of the act creating the Federal Board for Vocational Education, approved February 25, 1917, is also made available for printing and binding, law books, books of reference and periodicals, and postage on foreign mail.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 2, after line 16, insert the following:

"For additional employees in the Department of State, $85,000: Provided, That not more than two persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

"For stationery, furniture, fixtures, typewriters, repairs, and material for repairs, and miscellaneous items, including expenses of the passport office in New York, $25,000.

"FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

"For the employment of necessary clerks at the embassies and legations, who, whenever hereafter appointed, shall be citizens of the United States, $88,000.

"For allowance for clerk hire at consulates, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $325,000.

"To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs, as he shall think necessary for the several embassies and legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, repairs, postage, telegrams, furniture, typewriters, including exchange of same, messenger service, compensation of kayasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreters, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, San Francisco, and New Orleans, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of embassies and legations, and for printing in the Department of State, and for loss on bills of exchange to and from embassies and legations, and payment in advance of subscriptions for newspapers (foreign and domestic) under this appropriation is hereby authorized, $132,000.

"Expenses of providing all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, signs, rent (so much as may be necessary), repairs to consular buildings owned by the United States, postage, furniture, including typewriters and exchange of same, statistics, newspapers, freight (foreign and domestic), telegrams, advertising, messenger service, traveling expenses of consular officers and consular assistants, compensation of Chinese writers, loss by exchange, and such other miscellaneous expenses as the President may think necessary for the several consulates and consular agencies in the transaction of their business, and payment in advance of subscriptions for newspapers (foreign and domestic) under this appropriation is hereby authorized, $28,000.

"To pay the actual and necessary expenses of transportation, under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, of diplomatic and consular officers and clerks in embassies, legations, and consulates, in going to and returning from their posts or when traveling under orders of the Secretary of State, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $75,000.

"To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in China, including the officers at Hongkong, Saigon, Tsingtau, Dairen, and Vladivostok, in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $100,000.

"For the relief of American citizens in Germany or German occupied territory and American prisoners of war who may be taken by German forces, $80,000."

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee or some one on the committee a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. Before the discussion begins I reserve a point of order upon that amendment. That is a complete Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, or about two-thirds of one. I do not think it is germane to this bill, and under the rules of the House legislation of that kind comes properly from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amendment makes provision for a number of items in the Consular and Diplomatic Service for the current fiscal year. Any appropriation made for the Consular and Diplomatic Service for this fiscal year at this time belongs in the deficiency bill, and in no other bill could it properly be considered. There is an item here which is legislation, in that it extends to the employees of the Consular and Diplomatic Service in China the same relief that was afforded in the diplomatic bill to consular and diplomatic employees in belligerent and contiguous countries, due to peculiar conditions now existing in China. But, outside of that item, every other part of this amendment is not only germane and relevant, but properly belongs in this bill and is not subject to any point of order.

Let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that after the committee had concluded the preparation of the deficiency bill, as I stated yesterday, additional estimates were transmitted to the Congress aggregating $1,450,000,000. Among the estimates transmitted were estimates from the Department of State aggregating in excess of $900,000. There were a number of items. The committee investigated the estimates and reached a conclusion. The subcommittee reported to the full committee, and after consideration they were adopted, and they have been offered in the form of one amendment merely to save the time that would otherwise be taken in offering one after another. But, outside of the one provision to which I have referred, not one of these provisions of the amendment, so far as I recall it, is obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, of course I have had no opportunity to see the amendment, which is very long. In listening to it I thought there was something in the way of new legislation in the amendment. Will the gentleman please state once more just what there is in the amendment that is legislation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That part of the amendment?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On page 4 of the printed amendment the gentleman will find this provision:

To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in China, including the officers at Hongkong, Saigon, Tsingtau, Dairen, and Vladivostok, in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $100,000.

The Mexican dollar has increased in value from 40 cents to about 80 cents—I do not recall just the exact figures—so that the American gold with which our diplomatic and consular officers are paid has been reduced 50 per cent in value in purchasing power in the countries where the Mexican dollar is the standard of value. Those officials serving in China have found that their income has practically been cut in half because of the unprecedented rise in the value of the Mexican dollar.

In the Consular and Diplomatic bill for the current year extraordinary conditions existing in the belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto were recognized by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and they included authority of this character, so far as applicable to belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto. China is not in either category, and the State Department requested this authority in order to make provision for the employees in China along lines identical with the authorized policy in the belligerent and contiguous countries.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that the only bit of new legislation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The next provision is:

For the relief of American citizens in Germany or German occupied territory and American prisoners of war who may be taken by German forces, $80,000.

There are still some American citizens in Germany, and it is anticipated that there may be some American soldiers taken prisoners of war before the end of the fiscal year. The Government is still extending some relief to American citizens in Germany through intercession of the Spanish ambassador. All of the belligerent countries have adopted the practice of permitting little comforts to be sent prisoners of war from the countries of their nativity. So that if American soldiers should be taken prisoners of war our Government can permit to be furnished either commodities or money in order to provide certain comforts for them—tobacco, food, and some slight luxuries that under the usages of war would not be furnished, particularly under the existing conditions in the world, by the country which has possession of the prisoners.

Then in one of the provisions a limitation which is usually contained in the diplomatic bill is eliminated. At the top of page 4 is an appropriation to pay the actual necessary expenses of transportation. The diplomatic bill has for some years contained a provision limiting the expense of transportation to 5 cents a mile, computed by the most direct route.

The Secretary of State explained that in the first place, under the prevailing prices for over-sea travel, it is impossible to obtain accommodations within that amount. But a much more serious difficulty arises. The diplomatic and consular officers, for instance, coming on the continent to France may be directed to come to this country. There was one instance where an officer, directed to come here, went from Switzerland to Paris. He wished to proceed to a French seaport in order to take passage to the United States. He was detained in Paris for several weeks. Under the regulations he was not permitted to proceed to the seaport where he was to take passage. When he was permitted to go to the seaport he was detained there several weeks until arrangements could be made to furnish him with passage.

The result is that it is impossible to anticipate the time, the difficulties, or the expense to which officials of the Government are subjected when traveling abroad under existing conditions. It was suggested in the committee that perhaps it would be advisable to put some higher limitation on the total, but the Secretary of State, however, expressed the opinion that it would be difficult to state what particular limitation would be proper, and he thought it much more desirable not to put a limit at this time because of the difficulty of anticipating what the expense would be, and for the further reason that if the limit were once raised it would be very difficult to ever bring it back to the original restriction of 5 cents a mile, which he thinks is wise and desirable to be retained in normal times.

With these modifications and authorizations the other provisions are merely to furnish moneys to maintain the Diplomatic and Consular Service beyond the funds available by the Diplomatic bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. During the consideration of the Diplomatic bill I remember to have heard the last-mentioned subject discussed. I appreciate the difficulties that our diplomatic and consular officers have in traveling. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from New York for information. In connection with the appropriation to take care of the consuls and diplomats in China, did the State Department make any request for an appropriation to also take care of to some extent the consuls in other countries in Europe?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Provision was made for that in the Diplomatic and Consular bill of $200,000. It provided that additional compensation and allowance should be made in belligerent countries and countries contingent thereto, and the only necessity for its being put in here is that China is not a belligerent and is not a contingent country.

Mr. McKENZIE. It was my understanding that the appropriation made some time ago was not going to be anywhere near sufficiently large to take care of this matter, and I was under the impression that there would be an item in this bill to do justice to the Americans who are taking care of our interests in the foreign countries at this time. There is no question but that the difference in exchange, and many other items of expense, make it impossible for these men to live on the salaries they are receiving, and I hoped it would be taken care of in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The State Department, judging from the estimates submitted, anticipated every possible contingency. They did not ask additional money for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, which leads me to the conclusion that the funds available are ample at this time. If during the course of a year a situation develops that there is not enough, the Congress will be prepared to furnish the funds that should be provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be inserted after the title "Department of State."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Benning Road Viaduct and Bridge: For an additional amount for the objects set forth in the appropriation contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915, for constructing a suitable viaduct and bridge to carry Benning Road over the tracks of the Philadelphia, Baltimore, & Washington Railroad Co., $50,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is there anything in this bill relating to the Aqueduct Bridge?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; there is not. That was carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and there is nothing in this bill relating to it.

Mr. BORLAND. There is an item of $400,000 which was put in by amendment by the Senate in the sundry civil appropriation bill for commencing the construction of the Aqueduct Bridge at Georgetown.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is now the law?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 8, strike out lines 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the committee about this item. I understand $135,000 have been appropriated for this project, and this is an additional $50,000 for the viaduct bridge. What is the necessity for the $50,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The original appropriation was $110,000. The bids to do the work were very much in excess of the authorization, so much so that an additional $35,000 was appropriated. In the meantime prices had gone up so much that it was impossible to obtain the assent of the original bidders, and upon a readvertising it was found that this additional sum would be necessary in order to do the work. The committee considered very seriously whether in view of the increase in the prices it would authorize the work to be done at this time rather than to wait some time until conditions had become normal. This, however, is the most dangerous grade crossing in the District. A number of very serious accidents have occurred there and the necessity for eliminating the grade crossing is so great that the committee believed that in spite of the very greatly increased cost it should make the recommendation. This work is paid for, I believe, one-third by the Government, one-third by the District of Columbia, and one-third by the railroad company.

Mr. McKEOWN. I notice in the hearings that the chairman hesitated about this appropriation, and I personally think that all of these building matters should be deferred if possible.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The elimination of this grade crossing is deemed to be very necessary, and it is simply because of the very great menace to the traveling public through the continuation of that crossing that the committee believed it would be desirable even at the increased cost to have the work done as quickly as possible.

Mr. McKEOWN. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the temporary employment of such additional force of clerks and other employees as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the existing situation may demand, $4,261,232: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress on the first day of its next regular session a statement showing by bureaus or offices the number and designation of the persons employed hereunder and the annual rate of compensation paid to each: Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $1,800 per annum.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mention has been made to me repeatedly lately of an abuse that is supposed to exist, and I think it is possible does exist, in the War Department in regard to these employees. Under the present extraordinary circumstances we ought to give to the War Department all of the temporary employees that they need, and I have no doubt that we will have to enlarge the permanent force. The work of the department has certainly been extraordinary under this emergency. The work has come with a rush, and it has been work usually that had to be taken care of promptly without the slightest delay. Unfortunately, I suppose they have been working down there with green hands. They have had to bring in green men, inexperienced people, and under any aspect the difficulties of the department have been great and the inconvenience to the public has been great. We ought to relieve it as much as possible. My attention has been called to the fact that the liberal provision made in the Military Affairs Committee bill of $100 per month for men taking training in the Officers' Reserve Corps and the proximity to the training camp to Washington furnished facilities for a large number of these Government clerks to go out there and take the training. Naturally, a great many of them succeeded in becoming officers and have been commissioned. Complaint is subsequently made by department officials that that has depleted their force and taken away a good many of their men. But now comes the statement that some of these men after they get their uniforms and their shoulder straps and are drawing from $1,800 to $3,600 a year as officers are detailed back to the same desks which they occupied as stenographers and clerks. That is an abuse. There is not the slightest reason why men who are trained for officers, supposed to go with an army to the front, supposed to be trained for that purpose, given commissions for that purpose, should be detailed back to occupy a desk or an office anywhere in the War Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know to what extent that rule prevails?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I do not know to what extent it prevails, but it prevails. I was recently told a gentleman had his picture published in the newspaper to announce the fact that he had been appointed a major in the Judge Advocate General's Department, and the article gave his entire career. He has been a Government clerk in the department here since 1888, and the only thing that has happened to him since that time was that he has taken a two-year law course at Georgetown University.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, does the gentleman know whether or not he was sent back to perform the identical work he performs as a clerk or as a legal clerk in the department, or whether or not he was put on the Reserve Corps with the intention of detailing him to the Army?

Mr. BORLAND. He is sent to a desk in the Judge Advocate General's office; that appeared in the statement, that he was detailed to the Judge Advocate General's office when he had only been out of the department for a month.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I happen to know that question was raised in the committee.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Did the officer have any previous military experience?

Mr. BORLAND. Absolutely none, and his autobiography shows none.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Was he a second lieutenant?

Mr. BORLAND. No; he was a Government clerk.

Mr. SHERWOOD. And appointed a major?

Mr. BORLAND. He was appointed a clerk under civil service in 1888 and has served continuously since that time to this and had taken a two-year course of law at Georgetown University. That appears from his autobiography.

Mr. SHERWOOD. And made a major?

Mr. BORLAND. And made a major. He must have been a clerk at $2,000 or less—

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the salary of a major?

Mr. BORLAND. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The question I was about to put to the gentleman from Missouri was raised in the committee, and one of the heads of the Quartermaster's Bureau, I remember, was asked specifically whether or not any such practice prevailed in his department, and he denied emphatically that there was any such practice being carried on in the quartermaster service, and I am surprised to hear the gentleman make the statement with reference to the Judge Advocate General's Department.

Mr. BORLAND. Members of Congress have brought the matter to my attention as well as others.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman the denial was made with reference to the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. BORLAND. Which is one department, of course. There are repeated complaints of that thing being done, and it seems to have been brought to the attention of other Members of Congress besides myself.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. COX. When these men are detailed back to various departments, do they draw double salary?

Mr. BORLAND. No; here is the circumstance. Here is the civil-service employee who goes to one of these camps. He may be a good lawyer and they may want him back, but he could not draw a double salary if it was over $2,000. They walk out of the office as civil-service employees, and then they walk back again as a detailed officer. Then, of course, the department comes before the committee and says, "We have lost," and technically they have, "a certain number of our civil-service employees, who have either been drafted into the Army or obtained commissions, and we want a sufficient number of men to supply the places of those lost, as well as to do additional work."

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment. So that they have not, in fact, lost any man, and we ought to take that fact into consideration. At all events, we ought not to permit men who are qualified as officers and drawing a salary as officers to be detailed back to a purely clerical position in a department. I yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. DYER. I understand this case of which my colleague speaks is in the Judge Advocate General's Office?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DYER. And, of course, the experience required for such position is a legal knowledge in military law?

Mr. BORLAND. I suppose so.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman think they will be detailed to some camp or some cantonment for duty pertaining to the Judge Advocate General's office?

Mr. BORLAND. I suppose they will say that, if it was possible for—

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman, which he knows to be a fact, that many civilians have been appointed majors in the Judge Advocate General's office without any military training whatever.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know of any civilian being appointed major, but I know of one man who was appointed a major in the Judge Advocate General's Department, but he had been an officer in the Philippines and been judge of the court of the first instance over there.

Mr. DYER. I know of other cases—

Mr. BORLAND. Maj. Whitsett was appointed a major, and another man, Arthur Black, son of the late chief justice of Missouri, was appointed a captain. He was the man who had drawn the official code of Morocco and was engaged in compiling consular law.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman know whether or not the particular gentleman he speaks of submitted to any examination before he was commissioned, or was he just simply commissioned?

Mr. BORLAND. It was in one of the evening papers several days ago, where his biography and picture were given. His biography stated that he had been appointed a major, and the biography went on to say that he had entered the civil service as a clerk in 1888 and had been there continuously ever since, and that at some date there stated he had taken a two-year course at Georgetown University.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do not the hearings of the gentleman's committee further show that a large number of commissions were granted men working in the Coast and Geodetic Survey and who are commissioned as captains and majors and lieutenants and then kept at the same work they were performing before at increased pay because of the fact that they had been commissioned?

Mr. BORLAND. I was not on the subcommittee that drew the bill and I do not recall any such testimony.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The testimony does show.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman may be right.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. COX. I see that this bill proposes an appropriation or authorizes an appropriation of $4,261,323 for temporary extra work. I observe by the press every day that the clerks in the various departments are making a determined fight before the various departments, and later on intend to carry it to the President, to have a full Saturday evening for every Saturday of the year. If that prevails, does not the gentleman think that this appropriation will be a very meritorious appropriation? We would very likely have to double it up before the year expired.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman and I are in full accord about that matter. I believe the taxpayer is entitled to a square deal. We have to put a heavy burden on him under any circumstances, and I think there is such a thing as an honest day's work. I believe that a man in the District of Columbia working for the Government, and drawing down taxes instead of paying them, ought to be willing to give a full day's work in this time of the country's need. If they want 239 additional half days off, I am going to oppose it. I regret to have to do so, but I will have to do it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman has brought out a very serious charge, it seems to me, against the Military Establishment of our country, and it ought to be distinctly understood just what the facts are, if we can get at the facts. Now, there is no objection to any man who may be employed in any of the governmental departments taking the examination for a commission in the Officers' Reserve Corps?

Mr. BORLAND. None at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. And he may take the examination and be commissioned, and he may go right back to his work in the department, and he simply works there as a clerk until he is called or ordered to service in the line of service in which he was commissioned.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me understand the gentleman. When he is commissioned and begins to draw his pay as an officer?

Mr. McKENZIE. He does not, though.

Mr. BORLAND. You say then he can go back to his desk and draw pay as a clerk?

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman does not understand. A man may get a commission in the Officers' Reserve Corps and not be assigned to duty, and therefore he would not draw the salary as a commissioned officer, but would go back to his ordinary vocation until called by the Secretary of War to take up the duty for which he was commissioned.

Mr. BORLAND. In that case he would not wear a uniform, would he?

Mr. McKENZIE. No; he would not be entitled to wear a uniform. He would not be entitled to wear the uniform until he was ordered to duty. And I simply bring out this point in order that the gentleman may look into this case and present all the facts to the House, and not bring up a proposition that would throw a cloud over the head of the Secretary of War or some other officer of our Government unless the facts warrant it. If the facts warrant it, then we ought to know the truth.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that there is any cloud thrown over anybody's head, but it is our duty in this crisis to be absolutely as watchful as we can. We know that there is going to be a great deal of money spent, we might say wastefully, or at least in waste that possibly could have been prevented; but that is one of the inevitable results of war. War requires that hastily we must get together large equipment and large supplies, and it must be done under circumstances where the usual safeguards surrounding the expenditure of money can not be obtained. But even under those inevitable circumstances we ought to try to throw around the expenditure of money all the safeguards that we can, and if any of these leakages are likely to occur, the duty of any man who knows them and receives complaint that they exist is to bring them to the attention of this House.

Now, I do not think men ought to be detailed back to the desk they occupied in the War Department and the Navy Department. I do not think, if they are not needed as officers, they ought to be commissioned as officers. If it is the plan simply to raise the pay of a certain number of clerks from $1,800 to $2,000 that they get as clerks to $2,400 or $3,000 that they would get as commissioned officers, I do not think that ought to be tolerated. I do not think if it were thoroughly examined into by the heads of the departments, and that condition found to exist, it would be tolerated. My colleague says that the Quartermaster General's Office denies that that condition exists there. I am glad that is true. But it must exist in other offices or there would not be the complaint of its existence.

Mr. SLOAN. Is not this the case of using the time and energy of these men who were under appointment, but who by reason of the lack of organization of the Army had not been assigned to their permanent stations? Now, I talked with a man who received an appointment recently as captain, and he objected very much to not being sent to France but being set temporarily to do clerical work in the office of The Adjutant General; and, as he understood it, they were simply utilizing his services there until his assignment could be made. I assume there is a good deal of raw material in the officer-appointment ranks that could be used that way for a good while.

Mr. BORLAND. It might be wise administration to use the time of the men in the offices until they were needed in the war, but they ought not to be detailed there permanently. Now, if we need more employees in the Government—

Mr. GILLETTE. May I ask how much time the gentleman has remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have been interested in what the gentleman has said about the assignment of people who might be used in clerical work. Did not Congress pass at the present session a bill for the assignment of naval officers to clerical work? Did it not pass such a bill in the present session—a bill that was proposed and passed?

Mr. BORLAND. I have forgotten the details of the bill, but we did pass a bill, as I understand it, to permit naval officers to be detailed to certain technical work in the department.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Map-making work?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; map-making work, but it was not strictly clerical work.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Was the gentleman informed of that?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but it was to the matter of clerical work that I called attention.

I have had my attention called also as to the matter of men in the Army doing clerical work. I understand we have 141 admirals on the retired list. I think that men on the retired list of the Army or of the Navy can do a good deal of the detailed technical work required in the departments in Washington and in the Government activities elsewhere. That would relieve younger men who ought to go to the front.

Mr. MADDEN. They have been called in, in a large measure, have they not?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; they have been called in in a large measure, so far as the law permits. My qualification as to the naval bill was that I thought that work ought to be confined, as far as possible, to the men on the retired list.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree with you.

Mr. BORLAND. And thereby relieve the same number of younger men for active service at the front.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman as to that, but does he know whether there have been any assignments of naval officers to do that work?

Mr. BORLAND. No. I have no familiarity with the details of the Naval Establishment.

Now, I am opposed to exempting Government employees as a class from military duty. I think that all of the countries have found that they have got to utilize their man power in such a way as to send the younger, quicker, abler men to the trenches at the front, and that they will then have a large reserve of men who are not qualified for military service, but who are well qualified for all the clerical and other work necessary at home. I think we will make a mistake if we enforce the present rules of the Civil Service Commission in such a way as to shut out a large number of available men from clerical work who are not available for military service. I think that men who are available for military service, whether they are in Government employ or private employ, ought to stand an equal show of going to the front. They ought to be under equal obligations of going to the front, and they ought not to be excused on the ground that they can be used at home, because we know that, so far as the vast number of these clerical services are concerned, there are very few, if any, indispensable employees. Their places can just as well be filled by men who can not pass the requirements of military service.

Mr. COX. A large number of those positions can be filled by women, can they not?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; a large number of those places can be filled by women and a large number can be filled by men who would be rejected for military service.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish to be understood as stating that they are being excused from military service?

Mr. BORLAND. No. The order was issued, I am glad to say, by every Cabinet officer that there should be no excuses in his department except for those who are indispensable, and that they should be certified by the Cabinet officer himself as indispensable.

Mr. MADDEN. And that order is being carried out?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I understand that order is being carried out quite rigidly. That was by suggestion of the Judge Advocate General, and he further suggested that nobody be appointed outside of the classified service to take positions as inspectors in the Department of Justice and in the Secret Service and in these other places who would be qualified for military service. So far as possible, the men qualified for military service should be rejected in favor of those not qualified for military service. So that I say this thing of taking men qualified for officers and putting them into clerical positions would be indefensible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Benicia Arsenal, Cal.: For an addition to the main issuing and receiving storehouse, $18,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] complains of certain practices in the War Department in the matter of utilizing men who have been commissioned as clerks. I wonder if the gentleman has noticed the article in the first column of the Washington Post of this morning, under the caption "War supply tangles"? It is a very interesting article, and it would seem to indicate that it would be a very good idea if the War Department would utilize some of the very good men whom it has in its employ in carrying on its business rather than some of the new men it has brought in as officers from the outside. I repeat, it is a very interesting article, quite long, covering a couple of columns. I simply cite the last paragraph as a delightful illustration of the alleged splendid ability of some of the new employees. It says:

HE "LIVED IN A BRICK HOUSE."

The mix-up over the purchase of automobiles and motorcycles through bids opened in Chicago and then sent to Washington to be photographed and acted upon is too long a story to go into now.

A classic example of present methods is contained in a telegram from a purchasing officer of the War Department to various lumber dealers asking them to quote a price on "boards." When he was informed that it was necessary for him to stipulate what kind of boards and what sizes he needed and what kind of wood he wanted he simply said: "I didn't know that was necessary. I've been a clerk in a bank all my life and we live in a brick house." The fact that he thought boards were sold like bricks made no particular difference to him, but it cost the Government more useless delay.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Somebody ought to have told him that they were wooden boards. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Well he seemed to have grasped the fact that they were not bricks. That is as far as he had gotten. [Laughter.]

Now, I hope this article in the Post is largely imaginary. I hope it is largely rumor. I am inclined to think it is. I have simply quoted this facetious reference to certain alleged goings on to illustrate the Post article. It is quite full of generalities. There may be some considerable basis of fact in it, and then again there may be very little. It would be very strange indeed if in times like these there were not some mix-ups and tangles in the departments of the Government when they are expanding as they are. But I hope and trust for the good of the country that there is no such condition in the War Department as is indicated by the article in question, and if there is, I hope that these additional clerks that the committee is proposing to give to the department will, in a certain measure at least, relieve the situation down there, and to some extent clear up this unfortunate tangle, if it exists.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know where the information originated which has just been read by the gentleman from Wyoming. The advisory committee of the Council of National Defense has a lumber committee which is headed by a man who is universally conceded to be one of the best-informed men in the country on lumber, and it consists wholly of men engaged in the lumber business.

It is very easy to write and publish and circulate statements making the administration of the Government ridiculous. An examination of the hearings held before the Committee on Appropriations, however, where information was obtained from those in charge of the conduct of the Government's business and who knew just how it was being conducted, will disclose that too much credence should not be given by gentlemen from the country to fiction originating in the vivid imaginations of certain writers on the public press.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. If the gentleman from New York listened to the gentleman from Wyoming, he noted that the gentleman from Wyoming expressed the hope that this article was largely fiction. I hope it is, and if it is fiction it is the kind of fiction that I think we can easily have too much of in these times. There are other references to mix-ups or alleged mix-ups in the War Department, which, if they are true, would indicate a condition little short of scandalous. The gentleman from New York has referred to the fact that the Council of National Defense has a lumber-purchasing committee. Well, the article in question refers to a mix-up between the committee of the Council of National Defense and the purchasing officers of the War Department. It refers, among other things, to an alleged attempt on the part of the War Department to secure blankets for our soldiers, something that they need very badly indeed. It seems that a contractor was invited down here, who offered to sell to the department at a fair price 6,000 blankets for immediate delivery and 10,000 for delivery a little later, but he was told that the department could not purchase the blankets because it was necessary to have them purchased through this other committee.

"We need the blankets badly!"—

I am quoting now—

"and must have them," Gen. Sharpe, the Quartermaster General, said, in effect; "but I can not purchase them. You must go to the War Industries Board."

This the contractor refused to do, on the ground that this organization had no legal authority. He left Wednesday evening, and with him left the chance of getting 16,000 badly needed blankets.

I hope that is not true.

Mr. GILLET. If he would not go to the proper authorities, it was his own fault.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] suggests that if he would not go to see the proper authorities, it was his own fault. His position was that this committee was not legally organized, could not make contracts and purchases, and therefore he did not care to do business with them.

The article further refers to contractors being sent first from the purchasing officers of the department to the board, and then from the board back to the purchasing officers of the department, and not getting much satisfaction at either place. It says that this board assumed authority to make purchases without calling for bids, and cites cases in which purchases were made on prices fixed by the board, supposed to be low and in the interest of the Government, which prices developed to be much above the ordinary market price. Now I trust these things are not true. Even in a condition of very bad mix-up and disorder we should not be making purchases in that way, and I hope this is fiction, as the gentleman from New York suggests. It would seem, however, that there must be some foundation for these statements, and if there is any considerable foundation for them there is a condition of affairs that should be cured and must be cured speedily if we are to get on in our preparations for and prosecution of this war.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For an additional amount for an oil storehouse, $1,500;
In all, $82,500.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making a statement in reference to a contract which the Government has entered into for the manufacture of rifles. When I state the principle involved in this contract, the same principle runs practically through all the contracts that the War Department has entered into in reference to the manufacture of munitions of war.

The contract for the manufacture of a million rifles was entered into some months ago by the War Department with three separate concerns, the Remington Arms Co., the Eddystone Arms Co., and the Winchester Arms Co. The Eddystone Co. was awarded the contract for the manufacture of about two-thirds of a million rifles, and each of the remaining companies was awarded about half of the other third.

The contract is this: The Government agrees to pay 6 per cent interest on the value of the part of the plant which is actually used in manufacturing the rifles during their manufacture. In addition to that the Government agrees to pay to the manufacturers 10 per cent on the cost of the rifles. The 6 per cent is paid only on the amount of the plant actually used in the manufacture of the rifles. It was developed before our committee that there was no one who knew or had ascertained the value of the part of the plant that would be used in the manufacture of the rifles. I asked if a million dollars of the plant would be used, and it was stated that more than that would be used. I asked if $10,000,000 would be used, and they did not think so much. Then we were informed by Gen. Crozier that Mr. Scott, of the advisory board, was the expert who gave advice in reference to that contract and that he could give us that information.

Mr. Scott came before the committee, and Mr. Scott knew absolutely nothing on earth about the value of the plant, and when asked about it stated that he did not know. Then he was asked if it was as much as $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, and he said, "Yes; I think it is $18,000,000." I wanted to know facetiously if the Government had bought a pig in a sack. Nobody seemed to know anything definite about the matter.

Another feature of the contract which I think the House ought to know is this: Without going into details—because I will not have time to do that—the English Government, in order to get these three factories to manufacture for them a million and a quarter rifles, bought for the three factories $20,000,000 worth of machine tools, or those particular appliances needed for manufacturing the rifles, because the manufacturers, perhaps justly, were unwilling to purchase the amount of plant necessary to manufacture that many rifles and then have that machinery on their hands when the war was over.

They completed the contract for the English Government. Our Government then entered into negotiations with the British Government to take over that machinery. About $2,000,000 worth of that machinery, bought by the British Government, was never used by the factories, and that left about $18,000,000 worth of their machinery actually in use in the three plants. Our Government purchased, in round numbers, this machinery for $9,000,000, and for the purchase of material, odds and ends, ran it up to $500,000 more; so in round numbers our Government pays the English Government for the $18,000,000 worth of machinery, $9,500,000, or a little more than half of the value of the machinery being used.

I am not criticizing that at all, because under all the circumstances that was a wise step for our Government to take if it got quickly the rifles needed. What I complain about is this: The maximum value of the plant used in the manufacture of rifles by the three companies, according to Gen. Crozier, would be about eight million, although Mr. Scott seemed to think it would be eighteen millions, and he was the expert adviser of the contract. If the plant is worth $8,000,000—that is, the plant used during the life of the contract, which will be not more than a year—these companies will make 50 per cent on their investment in the plant.

That would be 50 per cent plus 6 per cent on the value of the plant, making 56 per cent. Now, of course that is a mere estimate, but I have accepted the highest figures Gen. Crozier placed as the value of the plant. It will probably be very much less, and, if less, the percentage on the investment increases.

Now I want to ask why it was that, after the Government furnished $18,000,000 worth of machinery, which cost the Government $9,500,000—why it was that the Government made this contract when it was apparent that such a profit would be made and no chances taken by the companies to lose a cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How did they fix the value of the machinery purchased for $9,500,000; was there a board of appraisers, or did Gen. Scott do the estimating?

Mr. SHERLEY. The $18,000,000 was exactly what it cost the English Government, and they took it on a half basis because England had made a million rifles.

Mr. SISSON. A million and a quarter rifles. The English Government bought $20,000,000 worth of machinery and at the time it bought the machinery the labor was cheaper than it is now, and so was material. So they bought $20,000,000 worth of that character of machinery cheaper than it could be bought at the time our Government took it over.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did not England want the machinery any longer, or did England get new machinery?

Mr. SISSON. England bought entirely new machinery when they contracted for a million and a quarter rifles. Their contract had just been completed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And we bought second-hand.

Mr. SISSON. We did. The Army officers inquired into the condition of the machinery at the time we took it over, and the testimony was that the machinery was in good condition, and nearly all of it practically as good as new.

I do not want to go into the details and dwell on that longer. Whatever they have done that is meritorious I want Congress to commend and I want to commend myself.

Then I asked Gen. Crozier what control the Government has of the purchase of material and fixing the price of wages. For example, if you pay a man $3 a day or $5 a day wages under the old régime, and that factory that employs him after he gets the contract pays him $10 a day, the company manufacturing the rifles makes $1 out of that expenditure of $10, whereas if it only paid $5 it would not make but 50 cents. If he buys the material in quantities where he would get a certain quantity for $100, and after he gets the contract he agrees to pay $200, or twice as much, he would get $20 profit instead of $10.

We finally got copies of the contract, and the Government has the right under the contract to purchase the material. Now, to what extent they have exercised that right the hearings do not show, nor do I believe that the Congress or the people ever will know.

Three big companies are manufacturing all the million rifles. What is puzzling me is to know why a great many of the small concerns capable of turning out twenty-five or fifty thousand rifles each could not have been given an opportunity to bid for the rifles. When I asked that question of Gen. Crozier his reply was, "We want rifles and not forfeited contracts."

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. What is it estimated that these rifles will cost us under the contract?

Mr. SISSON. When Gen. Crozier was on the stand he first stated $40. During the course of his examination it was said that if the rifles cost to manufacture $40 that would make $4 profit on each rifle. There was some protest about that. Some one said the General has not said that $40 would be the cost. I asked what it would be, and he said he did not know. I asked if it would be $30. He said more than that, then said that for the purposes of these questions $40 was about proper. So, under the testimony as you will read it, you will find that they expect the rifles to cost the people about $44.

Mr. MONDELL. That gives $40 per rifle in addition to our investment of $9,000,000 for machinery for the manufacture of approximately a million rifles?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. So they would cost us then, if that machinery had no value after the rifles were manufactured—which it would not have in time of peace, for we do not make that kind of a rifle—$48?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. We have been manufacturing Springfield rifles—

Mr. SISSON. Well, $48—a million rifles, $9,000,000, and $9 and $44 would make it $53.

Mr. MONDELL. We have been manufacturing rifles for about $13.50.

Mr. SISSON. My recollection is that the contracts made prior to this war were about $17.90.

Mr. MONDELL. And the estimated cost in the armories was between $13 and $14?

Mr. SISSON. I understand something like that, but I do not speak by the card, because I have not looked it up. When I was interrupted a moment ago I was preparing to tell you what they said they were paying the dividend or profit upon; that it was not upon the money invested. It was upon a going concern; that these people had what they claimed going concerns; that is, an organization fitted to turn out these rifles. It struck me that the going concern and the organization was paid for out of the $40 it was costing the people. In other words, if you have an experienced foreman and experienced workmen and you pay them fancy salaries, the salaries make up the cost of the rifle to the companies, and the people pay for the going concern in the $40, and pay too much.

In fact, we were and are paying for the organization, when we pay the $40 and then pay 10 per cent on the $40. But still this is the justification for entering into such a contract.

But the people of the United States, in addition to all of these advantages to the contractor, advances to the contractor every 30 days approximately one-tenth of the cost of the rifle. That is to say, the Government pays the labor and material costs by the month, so that the contractors actually execute their contract with the people's money and not their own. In fact, the people are called upon to furnish the plant, the operating capital, pay 6 per cent interest on the value of a plant not yet determined, and to stand in addition to that the loss of depreciation to the plant. Is there a business man in the world that would agree to such a hold-up? Yet the contractors would have the world look upon them as patriots.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know what the English Government paid for the Enfield rifle manufactured in these same factories?

Mr. SISSON. My recollection is, without the exact figures being given, that the English Government rifles cost them more than the rifles are going to cost us. That was the testimony of Mr. Scott, who stated that we would get cheaper rifles. Whether they took the $9,000,000 overhead charge off the English rifle I am not prepared to say.

Mr. MADDEN. Who is Mr. Scott?

Mr. SISSON. He is chairman of a subcommittee of the National Defense Advisory Board.

Mr. MONDELL. I had heard it stated that the English contract was for $27 a rifle, but I have nothing for that except hearsay.

Mr. SISSON. That information did not come to our committee. In fact I do not know that any of our people could tell with absolute accuracy what these rifles did cost the English Government, except in a general way that they cost more than ours will.

Mr. MADDEN. Who is Mr. Scott?

Mr. SISSON. He is the chairman of one of these advisory boards of the Board of National Defense.

Mr. MADDEN. A civilian board?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The civilian board did not have the power to take the letting of a contract out of the jurisdiction of the War Department, did it?

Mr. SISSON. It did not.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do they do that?

Mr. SISSON. I asked particularly about that. All of these boards are purely advisory. The right to make the contract and sign the contract rests now where it did before.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means the right to ratify the thing after it is done? The bureau heads in the departments have the same right to sign a contract that they always have had?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. But they have nothing to do with letting it?

Mr. SISSON. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Speaking of the rifle business, in what arsenals were the Springfield rifles made?

Mr. SISSON. They were made at Frankford.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And at Rock Island?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And at Springfield also?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know that for a year before the outbreak of the present war the making of Springfield rifles at the Rock Island Arsenal had been discontinued?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am advised that that is a fact; that for over a year before this war broke out, although appropriations had been made for that purpose, no rifles were being made in that institution.

Mr. SISSON. I have information that they did quit making rifles and did other work there, but I was not on the subcommittee and can not speak advisedly about it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where was this machinery which England owned and with which these rifles were manufactured?

Mr. SISSON. In the three respective plants when we took them over.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In this country?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand that the English Government had purchased machinery and fitted up factories in this country?

Mr. SISSON. Before we declared war. In other words, they made contracts with these three concerns in this country and purchased $20,000,000 worth of these machine tools for them.

In my judgment the tendency of these contracts is to increase the price of material and labor, entirely eliminates all source of competition, and, however good and patriotic and honest a munition maker may be, costs the people many millions, for there is that desire in every heart to make money, and this leaves the matter of profits entirely in the hands of three concerns, and unless our officials act with more business judgment in the future the people will pay dearly for this lack of efficiency.

There is every encouragement for extravagance in labor, extravagance in materials, and there is no incentive to be saving, except the miserable milk-and-cider sentiment urged by some, that these men will continue business after the war is over and will not want unreasonably to increase the price of labor or unreasonably to increase the price of materials. I have no sort of sympathy as a business man for that sort of proposition; and I do not believe there is a Member of this House, in the transaction of his own business, who would have entered into this sort of contract for the purpose of manufacturing anything for himself. I believe in competition; and if we had permitted members of these smaller concerns to put in bids for 25,000, 30,000, or 50,000 rifles we would not have impeded the progress at all in the million rifles and the Government then would have had the opportunity to determine whether or not it got just as good rifles and got them as promptly as under this contract, and whether this method would have been a proper method to have been pursued by the Government, even though they wanted to make contracts with these large concerns.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman any information that he can give to the committee showing the reason we discontinued the manufacture of rifles in our own arsenals, where we were making them at $13 apiece, and, instead of that, we let a contract at $53 apiece?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, it is only fair to say we are using the entire capacity of the arsenals now in making rifles; and at the time the gentleman from Illinois refers to when he stated that money had been appropriated for the purpose of manufacturing rifles and yet they were not used to their full capacity at Springfield and Rock Island to make rifles, Gen. Crozier testified some years ago, I think, when that matter was up, he had used part of the moneys which were appropriated for small arms for the purpose of manufacturing pistols, for which the country was shorter of its supply than of rifles.

Mr. MADDEN. If I may be permitted—

Mr. SISSON. My time is limited.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is making an exceedingly interesting statement. He is a member of the committee, and I ask that his time be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi may be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me now—

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was just going to say that perhaps the arsenals were occupied with other work which was thought to be more essential than the making of rifles, and that they were forced to make contracts with outside companies for rifles.

Mr. SISSON. My information in reference to that is that we use our own arsenals to manufacture those things which we thought we were shortest of and needed most. I want to state I have no criticism on earth to offer of Gen. Crozier in reference to this matter because I happen to know Gen. Crozier's attitude in reference to certain features of this contract. Now, I want to make one statement—

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will yield for a suggestion, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that at the time he speaks of when the manufacturing of rifles was discontinued at Rock Island Arsenal we had 800,000 Springfield rifles on hand and less than 100,000 soldiers in the Regular Army. There was no demand at that time for an increased manufacture.

Mr. PLATT. I want to ask the gentleman whether Gen. Crozier gave him any opinion as to why the Enfield rifles which we obtain by contract are to be chambered out to use our ammunition instead of making them as they did the English? The cost is increased by having to rebores them, otherwise we can not use the ammunition the English use.

Mr. SISSON. That was because our Army board adopted the Springfield rifle. There was a slight difference in the ammunition and they wanted the ammunition for all American guns, and I think that is wise, to be interchangeable so as not to get the ammunition mixed, which would be a very hazardous thing to happen if it should become mixed up.

Mr. PLATT. Why not arm the whole Army with the Enfield rifle?

Mr. SISSON. That is a matter that is absolutely with the board. The matter is within the province of the Committee on Military Affairs and with the Army Board, and the Committee on Appropriations would have no right—

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I can say Gen. Crozier makes the explanation that we should have the same ammunition for the machine guns as we have for the rifles. We have so many machine guns building to use the same ammunition, and therefore it is dangerous to use different ammunition for the rifles from that which we use for the machine guns.

Mr. SISSON. In other words, we want to make all the American ammunition as interchangeable as possible, and I think that is wise.

Now, gentlemen, the committee has been kind to me. My purpose in calling this to the attention of the committee is that you gentlemen may know as much about the contracts as do the members of our committee. You are entitled to know all that we know about the matter.

Now, personally, I am offering no criticism so far as the honest intention of the War Department is concerned. I do not believe that these gentlemen are intending to do anything except that which they believe to be right and that which they believe to be for the best interests of the country. But I do think that it is most unbusinesslike, it is most unwise, and the result will be that we are going to pay enormously more for munitions in this country than we would pay if we had some honest competition. And I understand that they started out with the purpose that during this war time we are going to eliminate competition. But when you do that you will find that these people who get the contracts will make enormous profits. I do not object to a man taking care of his own business. We are all going to do that. But we ought to understand at this time, when the war has hardly begun, so far as we are concerned, that we are the conservators of the purse strings of the country. The burden is upon us to see that this money is spent and properly spent. We turn it over to the War Department and Navy Department, and I should not put a single restriction upon the lines used in expending the money. Let them spend the money as they see fit and proper. But I do think that it is the duty of Congress to ascertain whether or not they have economically and honestly spent the money. And I do not see how you are going to do it without making some kind of an inquiry into it.

I do not want to put any sort of hamper on these Army officers in the expenditure of money. I want them to have all the leeway they now have, but in the expenditure of these stupendous sums that stagger the imagination of man, we, who are the guardians to safeguard the Treasury, should do our duty to the taxpayers of this country and see that when we do appropriate this money the officers of the Army and Navy have expended it in the manner for which it was appropriated, and that it has been spent honestly and economically and in a businesslike manner. [Applause.] And if you do not do that now you will find when it is too late, when the horse is gone, to lock the stable.

Mr. ROBBINS. Before the gentleman leaves that interesting part of his discussion, will he please state what plan he would suggest in order to keep track of the expenditure?

Mr. Sisson. There is only one way that Congress can do it, and that is to have a committee appointed by the House, and if able to agree with the Senate, a joint committee, to make inquiry into the expenditures of money, and, if anything was wrong, that it might be reported to Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that would interfere and be a reflection upon Mr. Scott?

Mr. Sisson. I do not think it would be a reflection upon anybody. On the contrary, in our private business we have men who check up other men on the same board of directors. We have men who check up items of expense in our business. We are the guardians of the Treasury, and I do not believe there is a Member of Congress who would want to hamper the Army or the Navy in the expenditure of money. I do not believe it would be wise to embarrass them in any way. But I do feel that Congress ought to have some of the strongest Members of each branch of Congress and let them employ some splendid experts in whom they could rely, experts who could be sworn to secrecy, experts who would be able to go through the books and contracts and be able to determine whether or not the money was being wisely expended. I hope that nothing the departments do could be criticized for will ever be found. I hope there will be no dollar dishonestly spent. I hope that there will be no graft. I hope that in this great struggle the Army and Navy may be able to avoid it, and that they will be able to have a clean sheet, if there is anything wrong done, that it may be only that of a degree of extravagance. But the mere appointment of such a committee would in itself and of itself be a restraint and influence upon any man that happened to be in the service and who desired to do wrong. [Applause.]

I think it is simply the part of wisdom, I think it is simply the part of justice, that we should ourselves have some way of ascertaining whether the vast sums we are expending have been spent wisely and honestly. God knows, I do not want to hamper them in any activity that will bring this war to a successful conclusion. But since we are spending all this money, it is the highest duty of Members of Congress to see to it that this money is honestly, economically, and well spent. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to go into any detail as to the contracts that have been made with three companies for the manufacture of the modified Enfield rifle. I have no desire to do that, because I believe more accurate information will be obtained by a reading of the hearings than could possibly be had by men trusting their memory of the hearings. Those contracts are set out in full; also all of the facts that we were able to ascertain in connection with the making of the contracts.

There were two matters concerning which it seemed to most members of the committee there might be considerable difference of opinion. One was that there had not been obtained by the Government information as to the value of the plant owned by these private concerns that was to be used in the making of these rifles, although there was an agreement in the contracts that 6 per cent should be allowed on the valuation of such plants. And in the absence of a knowledge of the amount of investment that was represented in that portion of the plant that would be used in the making of these rifles, there was no way to tell how large an investment these men had, and therefore, whether or not a 10 per cent profit upon an output of 1,000,000 rifles would represent a large percentage upon their capital invested or a small one. There was also some difference, I think, perhaps, in the minds of men as to whether 10 per cent represented a fair profit.

I really took the floor to state three facts which I think the record will bear me out in. One is that there will be found on page 867 of the hearings a statement by Gen. Crozier to the effect that the Enfield rifles cost the English Government $42 a rifle, or above that.

Another statement by Gen. Crozier is found on page 878 of the hearings, in which he says that he desired the record to show, "I am not on record as stating that I think these rifles will cost $40 apiece."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHERLEY. In just a moment. In other words, I believe it is the belief of the War Department that they will succeed in making rifles at considerably under $40 a piece, and it is the testimony that the English paid over $42 per rifle.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. What I wanted the gentleman to tell the House, if he can, is whether the United States Government reimbursed the English Government for the eighteen or twenty million dollar investment which they made in equipping the plants which are now making rifles, and whether we are paying a percentage on the investment on the assumption that it was privately owned by the concern that operates them?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not at all. We paid the English Government on the basis of 50 per cent of the original cost, because there was a certain amount of machinery which they retained, and which the United States did not acquire. What we acquired remains the property of the United States, with the right to do what we please with it. We made a contract with the English Government that seemed to be equitable because of the fact that the machinery, which was in good working condition, had made for the English something over a million rifles, and it was contemplated to make about a million for us, and the machinery under present conditions would have cost considerably more than what we paid for it.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I wanted to get at was this: The investment which the Government of the United States made is no part of the investment that a private institution has the right to make a profit on?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not at all. The contract expressly provides that the private corporation shall be paid 6 per cent on their investment—that investment that they have in that part of their plant that is used in this work—because in some instances all of their plant will not be used in this work and, of course, they get nothing on the value of the property of the Government that they bought from the British Government in the way of this machinery.

Mr. MADDEN. How do you segregate that?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is segregated by the fact that they are now making an inventory of the value of the plant that is now being used by these manufacturers in making these rifles, and only as that valuation shows will they be allowed to charge 6 per cent on that.

Mr. MADDEN. The private institution uses the Government's machinery?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How do they estimate the value of that, and the power, with respect to the capital invested?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is simply a matter of valuation. Personally I do not know how it is to be done, but it will be done by experts of the Government who know how to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have engaged experts in that matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to make another statement, because I think it is only fair, and I want to repeat that I hope the gentlemen who are interested will read the whole testimony, and read it with care, in order that my failing memory or anyone else's failing memory will not cause them to reach conclusions that perhaps an accurate reading of the testimony will not bear out. The reason that these men were given the contract for making these rifles was not with the idea of excluding anybody else. Any concern in America that was in a position really to make rifles—not to think it could make them, but really to make them—could have gotten a proper contract with the Government for making them. But here were going concerns, just finishing their work—not in every instance having entirely finished the making of rifles for the British Government—and it was possible with very little change in the machinery, so as to fit the new rifle for the American ammunition instead of the English, to go right into a large output for America. I submit that, while that fact does not warrant the making of any contract which is not equitable, it is a plain explanation of why these people should have been considered for contracts to the extent of the capacity that this machinery would meet, because time is of the essence.

Now, as to whether they should get a 10 per cent profit or not, I do not express an opinion. It has not been my lot in life to be a business man and to engage in manufacturing processes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHERLEY. In just a moment. I am personally inclined to think that, whether they should get 10 per cent upon what would amount to a $40,000,000 output—which would be $4,000,000 in the way of profit—would depend largely upon the value of the investment that they have in these plants; not entirely upon the amount of the investment, because that is but one factor. One of the valuable factors that must be considered is the ability of a going concern to do a given thing, of an organization that can be used for this purpose, and which if not used for this purpose might make a good deal of profit in some other activity. So that it is not possible arbitrarily to dismiss the value of an organization by saying it is taken care of by paying the salaries of the men who are in it. There has also got to be considered its earning capacity in various fields of activity.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, what I wanted the gentleman from Kentucky to tell me, if he can, was this: First, they are allowed 6 per cent interest on the value of the plant?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is used in making these rifles.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Now, I want to know whether the 10 per cent profit is also allowed on the 6 per cent as a part of the capital invested as well as upon the investment itself?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the contract sets out how the cost of making these rifles is to be arrived at; and one of the elements that go into determining the cost is an allowance of 6 per cent on the investment that this concern has in that portion of the plant used in making the rifles.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose that is on the theory that there is about 6 per cent depreciation in the machinery that is to be used.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; the Government owns that.

Mr. MADDEN. We do not pay interest on the machinery that we own.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. But only on that which is owned by the private concern.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Depreciation is also allowed.

Mr. MADDEN. Depreciation and 6 per cent also?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not sure whether it is or not. The contract will show. The 6 per cent, however, I think, was based on the money that was represented by the plant.

Mr. MADDEN. But they are getting the profit on the money value when they get 10 per cent, because, as I understand it, all of their overhead charges are included in the cost allowed and charged up against the manufacturer of the rifles.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman now is discussing the wisdom of the contract.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I am just asking for information.

Mr. SHERLEY. But inferentially.

Mr. MADDEN. I really do not know enough about the facts in the case to justify the conclusion, and I am asking the gentleman for information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am trying to give it as best I can, though again I prefer to have gentlemen read the contract rather than trust to my memory. All I want to say is this, that I am not undertaking to express an opinion as to the wisdom of this contract. Perhaps I have some opinion about it, but I hesitate to express a definite conclusion about a matter when the information I have does not fully warrant me in coming to a determination. I think that the testimony of Mr. Scott and Gen. Crozier will lead you to the conclusion that they endeavored to make as good a bargain for the Government as they could, that they realized the importance of undertaking the work, and that they did not find it easy even to arrive at the present contract. That does not necessarily justify the contract. I say that in fairness to those men and because I believe that whether their judgment has been faulty or not, they brought to a difficult task, where time was pressing, the best and most disinterested judgment of which they were capable.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is not this true: That if any improvements were made in the processes of manufacture while these concerns were carrying out this contract under the 10 per cent system the benefits would go to the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, entirely.

Mr. PLATT. While if any improvements were made under the contract system greater profits would inure to the company.

Mr. SHERLEY. Provided the contract was at a fixed price and with no variations. The Government would get the benefit of any cheapening of cost, and it is believed by Gen. Crozier that they will make these rifles for less than $40 apiece. And this also is to be said in fixing that price: That it was not fixed by guesswork. The Government has considerable information as to the cost of making rifles, having made them for many years; and while the old cost would not now represent what the Government can make these rifles for, yet, knowing the factors that enter into them and knowing the cost of labor and of material, the Government should have been and, I assume, was able to figure reasonably close as to what the cost of these rifles would be.

Mr. GILLETTE. Is it not also true—perhaps the gentleman has already stated it, but I was not here—that this was apparently the only way by which the Government could get a million rifles by next spring?

Mr. SHERLEY. I stated as much.

Mr. GILLETTE. I was not here when the gentleman made that statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. That it was exceedingly desirable that the facilities of these people for the rapid production of these rifles be availed of.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was this contract made? Mr. SHERLEY. The contract will show. I find July 12, 1917, to be the date of one of the contracts. It may be the date of all of them.

Mr. Sisson. Does the gentleman feel at liberty to make public the number of rifles which the Government has received under the contract?

Mr. SHERLEY. At this time?

Mr. Sisson. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know. I doubt very much whether they have begun to get rifles from these factories. Some little time would have to ensue in installing the machinery that would turn out a rifle of the caliber of our ammunition rather than the English ammunition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman please state why it was deemed necessary to change the caliber?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will answer the gentleman briefly, though there is considerable testimony on that point in the hearings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was not the English rifle satisfactory to England?

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason for that is this: We have in America ample capacity in Government and private plants for making all the ammunition of the American kind that we can use. Now, by a slight change, not resulting in any long delay, we shall get rifles that, while differing from the Springfield in their mechanism, will use the same ammunition, and it was believed it would result in less of confusion and less of trouble to have all our rifles carry our ammunition than to hasten by perhaps a few months only the delivery of the rifles and then require two different kinds of ammunition. That was a matter that was fully considered by the War College and by the War Department, and that conclusion was reached.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman if he can state to the House what percentage of depreciation is allowed on the machinery employed in the manufacture of these rifles, if he knows?

Mr. SHERLEY. Most of the machinery is Uncle Sam's, and that was not figured at all. The investment that these concerns have in the way of plant is largely in power plants, buildings, and land; but the actual machinery for making the rifles was purchased, as I stated, by the United States Government from the British Government, and is owned by the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. But there must be some provision for depreciation, and I wondered if the gentleman could tell the percentage.

Mr. SHERLEY. I could not without running through the contracts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The percentage is not stated, but it provides that a reasonable sum shall be allowed for depreciation.

Mr. MADDEN. But no one knows what a reasonable amount is.

Mr. SHERLEY. It will be done by adjustment, and it is fair to say that the Government will have the benefit of advice from the best experts in the valuation of plants and the determination of these questions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman tell us how many rifles we had at the outbreak of the war?

Mr. SHERLEY. We had, in round numbers, 600,000 Springfield and 300,000 Krag-Jørgensens in complete shape for immediate use. There were quite a number of other Springfields undergoing repairs that had been used in the Mexican border trouble.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do the Springfield and the Krag use the same ammunition?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If we are going to make new ammunition—

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not contemplated that the Krags will be used by the soldiers in the field. They will be used for training purposes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will men trained with the Krag have any difficulty in afterwards using the new Springfields?

Mr. SHERLEY. Practically none. While the Krag is being spoken of as obsolete, it is a breech-loading bolt rifle, and on the same basic principle as the Springfield and other modern rifles. That direct question was asked of Gen. Crozier, and he stated that they would require but little additional training to familiarize the men with the Springfield who had been trained to the use of the Krag. I knew that of my own knowledge of the two rifles, but I asked him in order that the record might show it.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is there anything in the statement that the Springfield will be used by the National Guard and the Enfield by the new National Army?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think this is what will happen: The troops as they go abroad will be supplied with the Springfield rifle, and when they are exhausted they will be supplied with the modified Enfield rifle.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, just one word. Members interested in these contracts should read the testimony, because the committee has obtained exhaustive information about them. I was one of those who raised the question as to the propriety of including in the cost of the rifle the item of 6 per cent on the value of the plant utilized by the companies in production. I raised the question because the contract provided for an allowance for depreciation. I know that no manufacturer who ever undertook business or engaged in business was assured that there was no possible chance of any loss in the enterprise, who was assured of 10 per cent on the cost of the output of his plant, and had included in the cost of the output upon which the calculation was based 6 per cent return of all the money invested in the plant. But that matter may be discussed later, when the matter is reached.

I wish to emphasize that this particular transaction demonstrates that the creation of a so-called joint committee on war expenditures would not have been of the slightest service unless it was given power to control the Executive's action; unless that committee had the power to say that such a contract could not be executed, that its terms must be modified, which would be an exercise of executive function, would have accomplished nothing that has not been accomplished by the Committee on Appropriations.

I may differ as to the wisdom of some of the details of these contracts, but after all the chief thing was to provide for the manufacture of rifles with which to arm the troops that are being raised. Some one must have the discretion and the power to determine what the terms of the contracts will be.

I have not seen in my service in this House anything to justify the belief that Members of Congress, if charged with the responsibility of executive functions, would discharge the resulting duties in any more capable manner than men taken outside of Congress for the same purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree with the gentleman from New York to the fact that the Congress ought not to assume executive functions and ought not to enter upon the question of letting contracts; but the question I would like to ask the gentleman is whether he thinks it is wise to enter into a contract one of the provisions of which is the allowance of 6 per cent interest on the investment involved and a certain amount of depreciation, which will probably reach as high as 25 per cent; also 10 per cent profit on the capital invested. My own judgment is that no contract ought to be entered into to pay a profit and the interest allowed on the capital involved, and that no profit ought to be allowed on the depreciation. That depreciation should be allowed to some extent for the wear and tear on machinery there can be no question of doubt, but the contract ought not to provide both for depreciation and interest on the capital and profit on both.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that in fixing the cost of production, from my standpoint, interest on the capital invested in the plant utilized, in view of the fact that an allowance is made for depreciation, is not a proper element in the cost. Some years ago when the Committee on Appropriations made an investigation as to the relative cost of the manufacture of powder in private and Government plants, when the statement of the Du Pont people was submitted showing the cost of manufacture in the Du Pont plant, the committee refused to consider the interest on the capital invested as an element of the cost.

But this is the form of contract which has been approved, and which it is insisted upon by representatives of the great business world who have been called into cooperation, is a proper charge. Of course the difficulty is that the very successful business man looks upon those matters from an entirely different viewpoint than does the man trained in public life; but Congress created the Council of National Defense with its advisory commission, it arranged the machinery by which the officials of the Government would have the advice and the cooperation of successful business men in the conduct of government, and it hardly lies with us now to find fault with their recommendation and advice when they do not happen to coincide with our own notions. The point I am making is that if a joint committee had been in existence of the character proposed, all that it could have done would have been to ascertain the facts that have been presented to the House. Unless it had devolved upon it executive functions, executive powers, or authority to control or to regulate, or requiring approval before the Executive could act, it would not have served a useful purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in ascertaining the cost of rifles, are the overhead charges included—salaries of officers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. In the first deficiency appropriation bill, because of the very extensive contracts that were to be made by the Ordnance Department and the necessity for making a large number of contracts upon some other basis than the usual lump-sum basis, cost-plus basis, authority was given to the Ordnance Department to obtain the services of expert accountants, and a division has been organized which probably is known as the cost-accounting division, in which a system is worked out and is to be applied by which the cost of manufacture in those plants on Government account is to be determined by this division. That force will pass upon the question of the propriety of the compensation paid. Gen. Crozier stated, and it should be said at this time, that while there was no definite knowledge as to the value of the plants the probability was that with the three companies utilized in the manufacture of these rifles, from his knowledge of a plant required for this purpose, an investment in plant necessarily utilized in the work of at least eighteen or twenty million dollars. So that the companies would have an investment in the plant of about two dollars to one for the investment of the Government.

Mr. HAUGEN. Just one more question. I understand from the statement made that, first, the overhead charges are included, and 6 per cent upon the investment and the deterioration, which makes a doubling up all along the line. First, they draw a large salary and add 10 per cent to the salary, and they invest capital and get 6 per cent on the capital and add the 10 per cent and the 6 per cent and draw 10 per cent for deterioration of their plant, and it is a doubling up all along the line.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not an expert on cost accounting. I have some views about the elements that should be considered in ascertaining cost, and depreciation of a plant certainly enters into it, and allowance for insurance and the overhead charges, and a number of other items.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have expressed the opinion that from my standpoint the allowance of interest upon capital invested is not a proper charge. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DALLINGER. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he thinks it is a usurpation of the Executive power for the Congress of the United States to prescribe some of the conditions under which Government contracts may be let and prohibiting certain other methods of letting contracts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all; and the place to do it is in this bill. The way to do it is by legislation. We have before us now a bill which carries money to enable the Government to obtain materials essential to the conduct of the war, and it is not only the function but it is the duty of the Congress in making these appropriations to put such restrictions upon their expenditures as in its opinion should be placed there; but after the appropriation is made, after the sphere is defined within which the money may be expended, then the expenditure of the money is a matter of Executive action and discretion, and to attempt to have sitting around as an overseeing committee, as an interfering committee, another outfit, although composed of Members of Congress, would be merely to add to the delays and hamper the action of the Executive. There is another function that belongs to the Congress, and that is after the money has been expended to audit the expenditure.

But we can not, if we are to keep distinct the various departments of the Government, undertake to perform the executive functions of the Government; and whether we believe that some particular official or individual is the wisest or the most distinguished or the best equipped to do the particular function is not the question. The executive power of the Government lodges some place else and the responsibility for its exercise is there, and a failure properly to exercise it or a disclosure of incapacity or incompetency or corruption is to be taken care of by the power that is lodged in the Congress of the United States. But this suggestion that a committee of Congress shall confer with officials every time they are to make a contract and to set their judgment up against department officials, to enter into discussion and wrangles, would mean that we would never commence to prepare for this war; and a committee of the size that has been proposed—some 11 or 12 Members of Congress—based upon my experience in dealing with Members of Congress and upon my own peculiar disposition and qualifications, convinces me we might better attempt to abolish the executive departments of the Government than to hamstring them by such an appendage.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. These are unusual times, and, of course, there are reasons that might be applicable in times of peace before an enormous war like this that might not be now so strictly applicable. The gentleman says if there was a committee of Congress to see about these contracts—

Mr. FITZGERALD. What does the gentleman mean by "see" about them?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Just what that advisory commission has done. Mr. Scott, who the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] says is the chairman of the committee to advise on certain things—and the gentleman from Mississippi says he asked him whether the cost was $2,000,000 or $18,000,000, and this adviser answered he did not know—urged the making of the contract, but he did not know whether the amount was $2,000,000 or $18,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think, in justice to Mr. Scott, it should be stated that when the inquiry was made about that he said that he had not been informed; that inquiries were to be made about these particular contracts and the details of the matter were not fresh in his mind, but that if the committee desired he would look up the records in his office and return with more complete information than he was then able to present.

Mr. Sisson. If the gentleman will yield for one moment, Mr. Scott, the gentleman knows, stated that he had not made any investigation as to the value of the plant.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true, but that was also accompanied by the statement of Gen. Crozier, who had worked with him, that he knew from his knowledge of these plants, because he has manufactured rifles and knows what rifle plants would require, that plants of that capacity to turn out this number of rifles within the time fixed would require an investment of at least $18,000,000 or $20,000,000, exclusive of machinery.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman said a moment ago that if a committee of Congress were appointed there would be endless wrangling with the executive departments and nothing done. Now, let me give an illustration: Suppose three Democratic members of that committee were the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. FITZGERALD], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. Does the gentleman think that if those three gentlemen were consulted as Mr. Scott is consulted, who is himself a manufacturer of rifles, there would be any more wrangling or any greater opportunity for postponement or delay than there is now, if we still leave with the executive departments the exclusive right to make contracts, as they now have, and sign them? The three Members of this House would not sign any contract any more than Mr. Scott does.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that from my intimate knowledge of one of the Members named by the gentleman from Wisconsin I am quite convinced that there would be very considerable delay and wrangling and difficulty if such a committee had to be consulted and informed and given all the information that would qualify them to express any opinion worth while, and by the time that particular Member was furnished with information that would satisfy him that he was in a position to render an intelligent opinion very considerable time of essential value would have elapsed.

At least this contract, after negotiations lasting weeks and months, was made early in July. If that particular committee suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin had also been consulted, it probably would have been September before an agreement could have been reached.

After all, there will be a difference of opinion as to what the terms of a contract should be. But if we have men who, because of their training, their experience, their occupation, their reputation and standing in the community, are men in whom it is proper to repose confidence, unless there is evidence either of corruption or gross incapacity, we must be satisfied with the discretion exercised and with what they do in the discharge of executive functions. Of course, they will be criticized. Discussions of this character are not without benefit. It puts those men upon notice that all of their actions will be carefully scrutinized and discussed, and that they must exercise in the wisest manner the discretion reposed in them.

But those advisory committees are part of the executive department of the Government. They have been called in because it is believed they possess experience and information gained by their experience in business matters not possessed by men in the military service of the Government. After they have reached their conclusions and have acted, assuming, as we must assume, that they are acting in the best interests of the Government and trying to do the things essential to be done at this time for the successful prosecution of the war, we should not make an attempt to hamper the administration by unjustly criticizing men because we differ from them in regard to their acts.

We may differ because of many things done in the executive departments, but, as was stated in a debate in the House of Commons a short time ago, and it is peculiarly applicable at this time here, a critic has a supreme advantage over an administrator. The administrator can only take his mistakes as guides by which to avoid similar ones in the future, while the critic has the unparalleled advantage of being able to assert that if he had occupied the administrative position the mistake would not have happened, and no one can successfully challenge the statement.

What we should do is to see that there is no incapacity, that there is no inefficiency, that there is no incompetency, that there is no corruption, and then we must rest content in the exercise of the executive power in the discretion possessed by the executive. Only when gross abuses are shown is it proper for us to interfere. But to have a committee of Congress, even if it consists of the brainiest, the most patriotic, most courageous, and most competent men that ever existed, to sit back in the shadow, as a perpetual menace to the official who is charged with the responsibility of doing something, and because fearful of acting until he had satisfied this committee, would be, in my opinion, the most grievous mistake that could be committed at this time in advancing the important work in which the country is engaged. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

I was present with the committee when this examination was made. I paid close attention to the hearing. Now, my recollection is, and my belief is, from the evidence, that there was a plant and it is owned by the party that has the contract.

It cost something—the capitalization of the plant. In addition to that, it was a going concern. I will speak of the going concern in connection with the profit a little later on.

The plant cost so much. The owner is entitled to 6 per cent interest, I think, upon the cost of the plant.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, under this contract?

Mr. CANNON. I think they are entitled to the 6 per cent interest. I am not much of a business man, but I would not take the best plant in the world unless I hoped to get my 6 per cent on the cost of the plant, because money is worth 6 per cent. That is No. 1.

Now, No. 2. There is a depreciation upon that plant. Now, if you count the depreciation and the interest upon the plant, you do not get any profit.

Now, No. 3. You have the plant; you have the depreciation, and you are entitled to be made whole, because so far you can come out of the same hole that you went in. Now, then, how much profit are they entitled to? My recollection is—

Mr. MADDEN. Before my colleague goes further—

Mr. CANNON. Let me get through.

Mr. MADDEN. Right there, I think, is an appropriate place.

Mr. CANNON. I want to state my case, and then if my friend wants to ask a question, all right. I want to complete my statement.

Now, my good friend and colleague, who is a successful contractor—a successful business man, with plenty of good, hard common sense—I think will not dispute the two factors. And I think he will not dispute the value of the organization. Now, then, come the operation and the product. Throw in the organization. In my judgment, after listening to this evidence, I have come to the conclusion that a 10 per cent profit was a reasonable profit for this Government to pay; and when I came to that conclusion I was satisfied with it, and I agreed to this provision in the bill and quite generally with all that is in the bill.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The thought that I had in my mind was this: That there is no justification for allowing 6 per cent interest on the investment.

Mr. CANNON. Why not?

Mr. MADDEN. Wait a moment and I will finish my statement.

Mr. CANNON. You could loan money at 6 per cent without cost or risk or depreciation.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true, but that would be the profit. When you loan at 6 per cent, that would be your profit. Now, I maintain that when you allow 6 per cent on the investment you have no right to add to that 6 per cent an additional 10 per cent on the investment, because that is what it means.

Mr. CANNON. My friend is one of the most successful business men and contractors in Illinois, and a man of good hard sense and enterprise. He would not be worth three hoorays in that place that burns with fire and brimstone if he had done business on the theory that when you run your factory you get only 6 per cent. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. What I want to say to my colleague is this, if my colleague will allow me—

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say right here this 10 per cent on the output may be very much more than 6 per cent on the investment.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. It may be many times more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think you ought to allow interest on the capital and the depreciation both, and then allow 10 per cent on the output.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I have investments on which I do not make 6 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. We all make losses. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. And I would not ask any more than that I should get 6 per cent on every dollar that I have invested. I do not think I ought to get 10 per cent on top of the 6 per cent.

Mr. GARNER. The fault of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is this, that when he gets his 6 per cent he does not count that as any profit. You charge off depreciation. Now, if you charge off all depreciation in any business, then 6 per cent must be a profit.

Mr. CANNON. But you have got to have something for a going concern. You have got to have something for the organization. You have got to have something for the risk, and with the change in the machinery when the style of the weapon changes a part of the machinery becomes old junk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no risk in this.

Mr. GARNER. If you charge off depreciation, you have got everything, and the 6 per cent stands.

Mr. CANNON. I am glad the gentleman has discovered that there is no risk in running a manufacturing establishment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that Congress has no business in attempting to regulate expenditures made by the Executive under congressional appropriations.

After our committees have carefully considered the estimates and the Congress has agreed to make the appropriations, believing them wise, it is the business of the Executive to expend the money. It is not only his business to expend the money, but the responsibility is that of the Executive. If Congress, after making the appropriations, should appoint a committee to be consulted in the expenditure of the money the probability is that that committee would hamper and delay expenditures, add to the red-tape already too difficult in its unwinding, confuse things, and inevitably it would make Congress through its committees responsible for the way in which expenditures were made, and our mouths would be closed in the matter of the criticism of expenditures.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. Sisson. Would the gentleman object to a committee the purpose of which was not to interfere in the least with the executive department in the expenditure of the money, but solely for the purpose of making inquiry as to how the money was spent and the character of contracts entered into?

Mr. MONDELL. I could not object to that kind of a committee without objecting to committees that we already have. We have such committees, and it is the duty of those committees from time to time, whenever there would appear to be any necessity for it to examine into these expenditures, to inquire how they are made and to present the matter to Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have such committees.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and if those committees would exercise their proper functions more frequently and more regularly than they do, it would be a very excellent thing, because they could inform the regular appropriating committees and the Congress with regard to the way expenditures are made.

But while it is true that the Congress should not attempt to share in the responsibility of the manner of making the contracts, it is the business of the Congress to make inquiries in proper ways, through these investigating committees, through its regular appropriating committees and otherwise, as to how the moneys have been spent.

Not only is it the duty of Congress to do that, but it is the duty of every good citizen to do it.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SEARS. Is it not a fact, however, that this Congress, by record vote, when the proposition was put up to us to provide clerks for these committees in order that they might secure this information, said it did not care to have any information?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the Congress said that. I did not hear anyone say that. I suppose that those who voted against giving these committees clerks did so under the impression—and I was not one of them—that the committees had not been active, and that they might not be any more active if they had these clerks, and therefore no considerable benefit would be secured. But I did not agree with that. I thought those committees ought to have clerks, and, furthermore, I thought they ought to do business.

Mr. SEARS. Does not the gentleman believe that if the chairman of the committee or the committee fails to do its duty after we furnish the committee with a clerk, the chairman should be removed, but that we should not refrain from giving them the necessary clerical assistance to enable them to do this work?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not care to express any opinion on a matter of discipline of that sort.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Some of us wonder whether there would be any impropriety or unwisdom in publishing in the Official Bulletin contracts like the one we have been listening to. Would it be dangerous? Why not publish them?

Mr. MONDELL. I presume there is nobody who would object to having that contract published in the Official Bulletin. Certainly the officers who made it should not object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The contract is set forth in the hearing.

Mr. MONDELL. But, of course, all the contracts of the Government can not be published in the Official Bulletin. It would require an exceedingly voluminous bulletin, and this particular contract is set forth here in the printed hearings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that under the law copies of all these contracts must be deposited in the office of the Secretary, where they are public records and are open for inspection. If any Member of Congress wants to keep track of them, he can spend his time over there examining them.

Mr. FESS. If the public had access to the contents of these documents, there would be no suspicion lurking in the public mind.

Mr. MONDELL. That would depend on the contract. The publication of the contract might increase the suspicion. That would depend on what view one took of the contract, its wisdom and propriety.

Mr. FESS. The suspicion could be avoided by the ignorance of the public in not knowing anything about it.

Mr. MONDELL. It is said that "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise." In this case the contract is published, and he who runs may read, and here is a volume that contains it.

Mr. BORLAND. The bare publication of the contract, with no surrounding circumstances under which it was made, might not lead to much information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York if he does not think, in view of the fact that we have had a pretty strenuous week and that it is Saturday night and 5 o'clock, that we ought to take a little rest?

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not take me off the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. After the gentleman from Wyoming concludes—

Mr. MADDEN. He has concluded, for the Chair has decided that his time is up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the gentleman from Wyoming wants a little more time, and after he concludes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] wants to make a two-minute statement. In the preparation of the bill the committee spent the whole summer, and I hope that some of these gentlemen who were not here during that time—not the gentleman from Illinois, who was here, but some others—will not object to staying two minutes longer on Saturday night.

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing to withhold a point of no quorum for two minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Wyoming wants five minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi two minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Not to exceed seven minutes, then—the gentleman from Wyoming to have five and the gentleman from Mississippi two.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman from Wyoming being extended five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. While it is true that it is the duty of the Executive to expend this appropriation, and that Congress should have no part in attempting to guide the expenditure, it is also true that it is the duty of Congress to consider these expenditures, and if they deem them unwise to criticize them. I have on several occasions criticized this kind of a contract, but I do it with some hesitancy, due to the fact that men who are well known in the country as successful business men are making these contracts on behalf of the Government. I had some experience in business before I came to Congress, and I know something about these cost-plus contracts. I never knew any business man who did not consider them exceedingly dangerous, and only to be entered upon under the most extraordinary conditions.

A contract that takes from the man who spends the money every incentive to economy and efficiency, every incentive to keep down the cost, and, on the other hand, increases his compensation, increases his income, increases his profits as the cost advances and inefficiency increases, is bound to be a delusion and a snare. It can not help being expensive. In nine cases out of ten it is more expensive than any contract that would be likely to be entered into under competitive bidding, even when prices are increasing and costs mounting, because when you take from a man the incentive to keep down costs in labor, material, and overhead charges added costs do not interest him except as they advantage him in the matter of increased profits. In this case it would seem that in addition to the contractor receiving 6 per cent income on his investment, full recompense for all the wear and tear of his machinery, a certain amount for overhead charges, he is to get 10 per cent on the cost of the output. Such a contract does not strike me as being likely to result in economy, as being wise or judicious, or one that the Government ought to enter into. It had been entered into before the committee took the matter up, but I, for one, hope that in the future in the expenditure of these vast sums of money the Government may find better forms of contract and pursue better business methods in the expenditure of the money than seems to have been pursued in this particular case.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that when I brought this matter to the attention of the House it was because I thought every Member of Congress ought to fully understand this matter. As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] just stated, this is a contract which was made prior to the beginning of the hearings upon this particular subject. Congress can not now remedy the contract. We can in this bill make provision for the future. The expenditure committee that I favor is not one to hamper the administration but to help it. I believe that the present committees of the House, if they would get busy, could do this very thing. I am not in favor of any committee that would have to be consulted before money is expended or that would in any way interfere with executive functions of the Government; but these expenditure committees have opportunities to do a vast service to the country if they were given the proper amount of money to organize and equip themselves with experts to look into the expenditures of the Government.

I want to call attention also to the fact that in addition to what the chairman of the committee has said about these people having this contract not being liable to lose any money and having an absolute guarantee against loss, they are not using any of their own money, because when the contracts commenced they were paid every 30 days for the labor, and for the amount of work done. An arrangement has now been made whereby they are paid every 15 days. They are doing business with the Government machinery and with the Government money, and if they turn this contract over a few times they are bound to make enormous and unconscionable profits, and I do not believe the people of the country will stand for that, especially when we are calling upon everybody else to serve the country at this particular time without enormous profits. Everybody is called upon to be patriotic except munition manufacturers. Why can not these people who manufacture munitions be patriotic? They connived for war and had more to do with bringing on the war than any other class. Now let Congress force them to exercise that degree of patriotism that we ask of others who get no profit but get all the burden. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Crisp, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5949, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INVITATION TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO VISIT THE BRITISH FRONTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following telegram, which was read:

LONDON.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington:

We have the honor to convey through you to the Senate and the House of Representatives a cordial invitation to send as many delegates as may be willing to come on a visit to Britain and the British fronts. We are authorized by the Government to say that such visitors would be the guests of the British people, and every effort would be made to show them all sides of our work in the war. As Parliament is not in session it is unfortunately impossible for us to obtain the direct authority of the members of the British Parliament for this invitation, but we feel sure that they would most warmly welcome the opportunity of meeting our colleagues of the Legislature of the United States.

FINLAY,

Lord Chancellor.

J. W. LOWTHER,

Speaker of the House of Commons.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HASTINGS indefinitely, on account of illness in his family,

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2830, extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark., a similar bill being on the House Calendar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge, authorized by act of Congress approved August 7, 1914, to be built across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark., are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date hereof.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. GILLET. Has this been passed upon by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. JACOWAY. Yes; favorably reported upon and is on the House Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does this provide one and three years for commencement?

Mr. JACOWAY. For commencement and finish.

Mr. ADAMSON. The general bridge law provides that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is an extension outside allowing them three years more?

Mr. ADAMSON. It just allows them the same time originally allowed.

Mr. BORLAND. One year for commencing and three years for completion.

Mr. JACOWAY. Both times having expired.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill—H. R. 5649—was ordered to lie on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS TUG RIVER, W. VA.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. COOPER] has a bill in the same condition (S. 2663) granting the consent of Congress to the Wolf Creek Lumber Co. to maintain a bridge already constructed across Tug River, which I ask the Speaker to lay before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Wolf Creek Lumber Co., and its successors and assigns, to maintain and operate, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, a bridge and approaches thereto already constructed across the Tug River at or near Wolf Creek near Kermit, W. Va., in the county of Mingo, in the State of West Virginia, which bridge is hereby declared to be a lawful structure.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out in lines 11 and 12 the words "which bridge is hereby declared to be a lawful structure."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Senate bill by striking out of lines 11 and 12, after the word "Virginia," the words "which bridge is hereby declared to be a lawful structure."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has that the approval of the War Department?

Mr. ADAMSON. This bridge was constructed without the consent of Congress under the supposition that Mr. Hughes, who was sick at the time, had secured the passage of the bill, and the War Department approved the bridge after it was constructed, and this bill is to legalize it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The House bill—H. R. 5267—of similar tenor was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing a short editorial from one of my constituents bidding farewell when he starts to the war in France.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The editorial is as follows:

TO THE PEOPLE OF MARION COUNTY.

I am about to bid farewell to you, possibly forever. Our country is at war with German autocracy, which must be crushed if democracy exists in peace. Our homes and our loved ones are in grave danger.

It is a time which tries the souls of men. It is a time when all able-bodied men must fight to maintain their right to live in the pursuit of peace and happiness. They must fight to hold their freedom and to uphold the Government which protects it.

The man whom we have selected as the head of our Government has formed and promulgated a plan whereby a fair and impartial selection of an army to maintain our freedom is now being made. Under this plan I am called to the colors. I reported to Camp Gordon Sunday for military service.

I was ready to go. I believe the war is just and necessary. I believe that under our Government a man can enjoy more rights than under any other in the world. I believe that our President is not only the greatest who ever occupied that position in our fair land but the greatest ruler in the world to-day. I believe that our Congress is composed of the highest order of intelligence in the world, and that they would never consider plunging our country into this war had it not been absolutely necessary to maintain our place at the head of the nations of the earth. The stars and stripes of Old Glory stand for justice and freedom, and it is for this that we are fighting—freedom for the world as well as ourselves.

If I have made any enemies, it was not my intention, for I harbor no bitterness in my heart against any man. I hope that my enemies will always be in front of me, and that some day, when victory is ours, I may return from the battle field with a clean record.

The day of our return is uncertain in the extreme. The war may last 5 or 10 years or it may close within a year. Victory will not be ours until, as one editor expressed it, "a long-limbed, tan-checked southern gentleman walks arrogantly down the broad streets of Berlin, strikes a match on Hindenberg's monument, and throws a quid of tobacco in the stony face of the Kaiser's statue; not until then will we or the soldier lads be entirely satisfied." I hope I will be that man.

Your friend,

T. A. D. WEAVER.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting an address delivered by Hon. HENRY W. TEMPLE, of Pennsylvania, at the annual meeting of the Maryland State Bar Association, held at Atlantic City, June 21, 1917, on "Our war for law and civilization."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing a memorial on the life and character of former United States Senator Patterson, of Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by printing a memorial address on the life and character of the late Senator Patterson, of Colorado. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS ON MONDAY.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the deficiency bill have the same privilege on Monday as on other days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the deficiency bill have the same status on next Monday that it has on any other day. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like the gentleman to couple with that that the business in order on Monday may be in order immediately after the completion of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to object to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am interested—

Mr. MADDEN. I thought we were to adjourn three days at a time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the reason I ask that is that there is a bill or two that we have been trying to get up by unanimous consent, and if there is still objection I think they ought to have a chance to pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there are no bills pending in either House of Congress more imperatively needed than the one under consideration in the House now. This is the only bill I am interested in pressing for consideration—

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no conditions—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the liberty of jogging the memories of gentlemen by stating that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] got his alien slacker bill, or whatever the title of it is—

Mr. MADDEN. He did not get any consent on that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk says he did not get it, so the Chair was mistaken. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent—

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not feel that the gentleman from New York ought to ask entirely to dispense with unanimous-consent day and put it off for two weeks when we might not have a quorum here at the time any of these bills—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Notice has been served that objection will be made for some day to be fixed in regard to those bills. This is a bill that should be considered, and it is my duty to make the request to enable it to be considered.

Since objection will be made to setting that business down after consideration of the bill, I can not make a request that I know will not be granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the present pending deficiency bill have the same right for consideration on next Monday as it would have on any other day.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Unless there can be some understanding that the entire unanimous consent of Monday is not going to be wiped out at this session of Congress in some way, I must object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I give notice to the gentleman that if objection is made no bill will pass on Monday by unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] will just waste a day if every bill is going to be objected to, as it will be under these circumstances.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest that probably the gentleman who gave notice that he would not permit unanimous-consent day to follow this bill might reconsider.

Mr. GILLETT. We may when the time comes.

Mr. MADDEN. When the time comes, when this bill is completed, if the gentlemen who are interested in unanimous-consent bills wish to make the request, I will not object to it then, but I will object to having it coupled with this.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman does not propose, then, to take the stand now that he will not have unanimous-consent day, but will wait until the time comes?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether some gentleman is going to make objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I think unless the gentleman wants to assume the responsibility of objecting to the consideration of this bill, the money in which is being appropriated for the Government, he ought not to object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have not objected to unanimous consent in nine years on the floor of this House. I have permitted everything to go on here, but I do feel as a Representative from the West that when we have some bills here that are certainly important to our section of the country, while I do not want to interfere with this bill at all, at the same time I certainly feel that we must object to any attempt to entirely cut off the unanimous-consent day. All I ask is that the gentleman should allow us, when this bill is concluded, to take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It seems to me it is perfectly fair.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to having the gentleman's request coupled with the request of the gentleman from New York. When the time comes for him to make that request, when this bill is out of the way, I do not think he will have much trouble about it. At least he will not have any from me.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have some interest in the Unanimous Consent Calendar, but under the circumstances, if we object to the request of the gentleman from New York, the call of the Calendar Monday will be a farce and our bills will be stricken off and we will gain nothing by it. I think we had better let the gentleman have his request granted and trust to the fairness of the gentleman afterwards.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is all right; but I do not propose to be bluffed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are several bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that are of some importance, and particularly of importance to the West. And I do not think gentlemen should take the air they have in this matter and insist that if objection is made now to unanimous-consent day being set aside there will be no unanimous consent allowed. I do not think that is quite the proper attitude. I am of the opinion that we ought to go on with this appropriation bill Monday, and I hope the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] will not object, but, at the same time, gentlemen must understand that the men from the region affected by these important bills can not allow the day of grace to go by without at least suggesting that they expect an opportunity within a reasonable length of time to have their matters considered.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman is perfectly right, but they did more than suggest that they would like to have an opportunity. They threatened to object to this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no.

Mr. MONDELL. I thought the threat was on the other side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I made the statement. Let there be no misunderstanding about it, Mr. Speaker. If the House is unwilling to proceed with this bill, which it is imperatively required should be passed for the proper conduct of the operations of the war, then the House will do no business by unanimous consent while the consideration of the bill is held up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on the Monday following next Monday—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I insist—

Mr. GILLETT. I object to any particular day being set now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the request I have submitted be passed on first.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, September 17, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 145), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 6094) amending the act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, etc.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SWIFT: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 21) providing for the printing and binding of the messages and papers of the Presidents for the period of 1897 to 1917; to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 6095) granting a pension to Esther A. Weeks; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FAIRFIELD: A bill (H. R. 6096) granting a pension to Sanford T. Chapman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FERRIS: A bill (H. R. 6097) granting an increase of pension to Elbridge H. Benham; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GALLAGHER: A bill (H. R. 6098) for the relief of John Marks; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6099) granting a pension to Ellen A. Cardenas; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KRAUS: A bill (H. R. 6100) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Lloyd; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 6101) to correct the military record of the late Allen M. Stratton; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6102) granting an increase of pension to Sarah J. Wood; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6103) granting a pension to Joseph C. Betancue; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6104) granting a pension to George E. Lawrence; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SLAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 6105) granting a pension to Charles W. Anderson; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. GRIEST: Petition of Henry C. Meyer, John Baechle, F. J. Jarosch, Otto W. Schaefer, Charles Hiemer, and Adolf F.

Woerner, of Lancaster, Pa., favoring the exchange of censored news between parties living in the United States and those within the territory of the central powers; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Resolution of Washington Council, No. 2, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Providence, R. I., favoring passage of House bills 4852 and 5369 respecting enforcement of immigration law; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. PETERS: Petition of H. B. Frost and 36 others, residents of Monmouth, Me., urging action on the food bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of Samuel Adams and 31 other citizens of Belfast, Me., urging the passage of the purple-cross bill, House bill 5410; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

SUNDAY, September 16, 1917.

The Senate met at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee in the quiet hour of the holy Sabbath Day to worship and to make mention of the character and service of one whom Thou hast called to his final reward. We memorialize the name of a comrade in service who by Thy grace measured up to the responsibility of this office.

We bless Thee that Thou hast ever laid Thy hands upon men who have come up from every part of the country to the central council of the Nation inspired with the ideals of freedom and justice, and that Thou hast kept them true to the traditions of a Nation founded upon the precepts of Thy Holy Word.

We bless Thee for the life and character of the late Senator whose name is mentioned this day, whose service on earth closed with his labors in this Senate. We praise Thee that he leaves behind him a sacred memory that will be cherished as long as the country endures. His name will be on the scroll of honor as one pure and steadfast in principle and unyielding in devotion to the truth and to God.

Now, we pray Thee to give to us a solemn sense of the reality of life. Lead us all in the path of duty and prepare us for the final issues for which we must answer before the judgment seat of God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR HARRY LANE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, pursuant to notice heretofore given I offer the resolutions which I send to the Secretary's desk, and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 131.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. HARRY LANE, late a Senator from the State of Oregon.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, we are here to-day to pay the last sad tribute of respect to our late colleague and friend, HARRY LANE, of Oregon. The best testimonial to his worth, however, is to be found in the love which was entertained for him by his friends and neighbors of a lifetime in the State of his birth, and which he in part represented at the time of his death.

HARRY LANE was the product of pioneer days in the West. His grandfather, Gen. Joseph Lane, after participating with marked distinction in the Mexican War, went to Oregon in 1848 as Territorial governor by appointment of President Polk, and remained there when the war was over. In 1859, after having served a number of terms as a Delegate in Congress, Gen. Lane was elected to represent his State in this body, and in the presidential election of 1860 was a candidate for the Vice Presidency on the ticket with the late John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky. Like his grandson, he was possessed of great physical as well as moral courage, and those traits were inherited by and strongly emphasized in our late colleague.

The life of the early pioneer was calculated to develop vigorous minds as well as strong bodies, and HARRY LANE was no exception to the rule. Surrounded as he was by the adventurous spirits of those early days, he imbibed their modes of independent thought and action. As they blazed a trail across miles of desert wastes, over rugged mountains and dangerous and swollen streams, without chart or compass to guide them, in order to establish a civilization in the western wilds, so they were accustomed to reason for themselves and untrammelled by precedent to formulate rules and ways of life to suit the new conditions and a strange environment. There were no slackers in that new world of theirs. Every man and every woman had a part to play in the economy of things, and well, indeed, they played it, finally bringing the Oregon country under the American flag, establishing a government of their own in advance of any act of Congress creating a Territorial form of government. Amongst such a people and in such an environment HARRY LANE was born 62 years ago. His birthplace was the then little town of Corvallis, on the banks of the beautiful Willamette, in speaking of which and in portrayal of its beauty a pioneer poet of Oregon said:

Spring's green witchery is weaving
Braid and border for thy side;
Grace forever haunts thy journey,
Beauty dimples on thy tide;
Through the purple gates of morning
Now thy roseate ripples dance,
Golden then, when day, departing,
On thy waters trails his lance.
Waltzing, flashing,
Tinkling, splashing,
Limpid, volatile, and free—
Always hurried
To be buried
In the bitter, moon-mad sea.

Looking out from his humble boyhood home upon the landscape, whether to the east or to the west, his youthful eyes beheld the lofty mountains of the Cascade and Coast Ranges, snow-capped and sun-crowned, clad from base to summit in perpetual green.

I have sometimes thought that much of the rugged honesty of character, thought, and disposition of HARRY LANE was but a reflection of these scenes and of the mountains that were the companions of his youth. For he was the very soul of honor, and in the struggles he encountered through life, in the political contests he waged, no one ever at any time questioned the integrity of his motives nor the loftiness of his purposes. Honest, generous HARRY LANE!

O good, great heart that all men knew,
O iron nerve, to true occasion true;
Fallen at length, that tower of strength,
Which stood foursquare to all the winds that blew.

Since his death I heard a distinguished gentleman and acquaintance say "Senator LANE was a most lovable character, but I was never quite able to calculate his orbit." That summed up his character in a sentence. No man could, but all who knew him could safely say that whatever his orbit might be, his direction, his aim, his purpose was toward the right, toward honesty, toward justice and equality of opportunity to all, to the humblest as to the most exalted.

I first came to know Senator LANE well while he was superintendent of the Oregon Hospital for the Insane, to which position he was appointed by Gov. Sylvester Pennoyer. At the time of his appointment he was practicing his profession as a physician at Portland. He immediately set to work to bring about a change in conditions at that institution. He was then, as he always was, restive under restraint. He followed no rule because it was of long standing unless it had merit. He did not believe in the doctrine that what was good enough for the father is good enough for the son. His practice was to follow a general scheme because it was right, and his purpose always was to reach higher ideals and loftier standards. He could never be patient to reach an end by slow degrees. He wanted to reach it at once. For that reason it was hard for him to compromise, and hence he could not do what is usually denominated as team work. With the exception of a few occasions when he first came to the Senate he did not attend the conferences of his Democratic colleagues, and was therefore at variance with them much of the time. Yet no one questioned his integrity of purpose. Because he saw but one way to accomplish an end he thought everyone ought to see it and reach it by the quickest route. He did not like circumlocution and would not stand for it even if by it he would eventually reach the same goal for which he was striving. So in his conduct of the State hospital he broke through the regulations of a generation of his predecessors and made things unpleasant for the sticklers for precedent. The general result of his incumbency of the position of superintendent was beneficial, and many of the plans formulated by him are still in force. Upon his retirement from this position he resumed the practice of medicine in his home city. He always commanded a large practice, but he never made any money for the simple reason that he would not charge the poor either for services or medicines which he furnished. "His hand was open as the day, and his heart was a great temple in which thronged all the kindly emotions." No man, woman, or child ever came to him suffering or in want that he did not give aid and comfort without money and without price. He was ever ready to give his last penny to one in need or in distress. Is it any wonder, then, that he could not save money at his profession? There are thousands of people living in the West who have benefited by his kindness and generosity and who rise now to call him blessed.

Senator LANE served two terms as mayor of the city of Portland. In one of his contests his opponent was a gentleman who had served as Attorney General of the United States during Gen. Grant's administration and was later appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, failing, however, of confirmation. The contest was a bitter one, but Senator LANE's popularity with the masses and his promises to reform conditions of municipal life won him a victory. During both his terms he devoted all his energies to carrying out his prelection pledges, and he did make Portland a better place to live in. He drove out the thugs and gamblers and purified districts which prior to his administration had been given over to every form of vice. He made no compromises, but hewed to the line with the sole aim and purpose to correct evils in municipal government, to make the lot of the laboring man easier, to cut out every form of graft, and to see to it that everyone received a square deal at the hands of those in authority. No administration was ever more stormy, and none ever so fruitful of beneficent results.

Speaking of his record as mayor and of him as a man, one of the local papers of Portland, shortly after his death, said:

As mayor of Portland he was quick to sense the harmonious relation between powerful figures and the vice ring. With equal celerity he comprehended the inside hold that big institutions maintained in the city and out of which they profited at the expense of the public and the masses.

He was as quick to realize the illegitimate traffic in public contracts, in gambling, and the ruinous effect which invisible government was working in the city. Fearless and free, as courageous as he was honest, Mayor LANE, with these abuses once visualized, was instantly in action, and it was an action from which no friend, no groups of friends, or other human power could stay his hand. With him it was a fight with public wrong, and a fight without compromise, a fight to the death.

The effect of his conflicts with invisible government is beheld in Portland to-day. He opened the closed eyes of the public to what was going on. He threw the searchlight of a pitiless publicity on abuses and practices of whose existence the people had not dreamed. Wherever he found wrong in the municipal structure he smote it and exposed it. Without a LANE, Portland might still be in the mire of those rotten times. His work of reform in the chief city of the State was heard of in rural and remote Oregon and exercised factorship in the great conflict for redeeming and reclaiming the Commonwealth from the vicious and corrupt influences of the old politics and politicians.

Information that a great conflict was going on to reform its chief city was of psychological value in stimulating reform in the State's public life; for with knowledge that they had an ally waging war at the fountain head of corruption, the reform forces in the country were encouraged to arm for State-wide struggle.

LANE saved to the people many a public right and a deal of public property that was gradually slipping into the hands of private interests. He turned the mood and movements of the community into new plans and purposes.

He organized and captained forces for assaulting the citadels of plunderbunds and for squaring government with the ideals of conscience and honesty.

His two administrations as mayor stand out in Portland annals. They were not inane administrations. They were not, as many administrations have been, forgotten because they stood for nothing. Other mayors came and passed unproclaimed and unobserved because unworthy of comment.

There would have been a third mayoralty for HARRY LANE, had he desired it. The people were ready to elect him and many an appeal fell upon his ears for renewal of his candidacy. But he was worn and spent with the incessant, unflinching resistance and assaults of entrenched privilege. He was weary with it all, just as he became wearied and lay down and died amid the pressing responsibilities of the senatorship. He refused the proffered distinction and retired to that privacy of endeavor to which many a public man often turns with keen delight.

Times and events offered HARRY LANE as Senator no such opportunity as came to him as mayor. That he carried into the upper branch of Congress the same innate honesty and fearless conviction that distinguished his public life on lower levels, we all know from his independence of action and from his votes on the momentous issues of armed neutrality and a state of war.

It was his alone to pass judgment according to his conscience on those great questions. It was his alone, under his oath, to decide on those tremendous alternatives because it was his alone to assume responsibility for his action.

HARRY LANE chose his course, and proof of how tremendously he viewed the issue is in the fact that he paid for his choice with his life. He acted as he believed and acted in the face of an overwhelming opposition.

A country or a people could not ask him to do more. A country or a people can not in honor ask any man to violate his conscience or be dishonest with his convictions. For that reason, Senator LANE in the slings and arrows of a partisan and persecuting press encountered an injustice that he did not deserve and it was an injustice that, in the stress of the time, was followed by a nervous breakdown from which there was no deliverance.

It is a good thing for communities to have Lanes in public life. Straddle-bug politicians who lay low and follow the drift are of no value.

It is men with ideals and spirit and purpose and honesty that make a real career and that leave a lasting impress upon the civic life. That impress is Senator LANE's monument and it is a nobler monument than can be raised in bronze or marble.

Senator LANE was elected to the Senate at the fall election in 1912. He showed upon his entrance here the same disregard of precedents that characterized his whole life. He immediately took part in the discussion of great public questions, and upon all occasions showed an intimate acquaintance with men and affairs. He made no pretensions to eloquence and claimed no distinction as an orator. He plunged into the middle of a subject and always contributed to the sum of information upon it. Possessed of a happy way of expressing his views, there was frequently a vein of humor in him that attracted attention and gave pungency to the point he was endeavoring to make. Fearless at all times, he did not hesitate to differ from his warmest personal and political friends. His record here is so recent and so well understood that I do not deem it necessary to discuss it. His attitude with respect to armed neutrality and the war with the Imperial German Government proved more than any of his public acts his great moral courage. He was at variance with the great majority of his colleagues, and did not fear to give expression to his views. He hated war, and his tender heart and the horror of bloodshed led him to hope that a crisis might be averted. But his motives were misunderstood by enemies and friends alike, with the result that he was most brutally and unjustly assailed by many of the public journals throughout the country. The injustice of these attacks, in my opinion, made acute a disease that was lurking in his system, and unquestionably hastened his death. He was charged with engaging in a filibuster against the armed neutrality bill, which was wholly unmerited. He was charged with treachery to his country, which was entirely untrue, for there was never a man whose heart was more truly loyal than HARRY LANE's, and after war was once declared he would have contributed the weight of his influence and his every vote to the making of American arms successful. No one will ever know what anguish he suffered under these unjust charges, and I really believe they almost broke his noble, generous heart.

I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read a sketch of HARRY LANE by one of his warmest personal and political friends, Hon. R. W. Montague of Portland, Oreg. It is so true to life that this record would not be complete without it. He says:

No one can forget HARRY LANE who ever came close to that unique and vivid personality. A mind leaping, swift, intuitive, sudden and unpredictable in its way of attack on the commonest questions, a pungent wit, abundant zest of life, genial readiness in intercourse with all sorts and conditions of men, all these were apparent at once, but these were not all, nor was all comprised in these as modified by the human defects, of which he had full share.

His physical appearance contributed no little to the sum of the impression he made. Plain yet very striking features, a prominent, almost aquiline nose, firm, straight, thin-lipped mouth, and keen steel-blue eyes gave rather a grim expression to his face when not lit up by the habitual look of animation that gave it a characteristic charm. His face was finely set off by abundant wavy hair and a peculiar elate carriage of the head that drew the eye at once. Of only middle size, he possessed remarkable muscular strength and activity, and his bearing had an alert readiness that reminded one irresistibly of a swordsman of Dumas and left an impression of perfect physical competence.

I remember that once when a man named Lane was hurt in a street accident the rumor ran that it was Dr. LANE. A shrewd friend of his remarked to me, "They told me Harry was run over by a street car, but I said, 'No, not that fellow. Some other Lane, maybe, but no street car will ever run over HARRY.'"

He was an ardent lover of nature, and was never so happy as when pursuing some inquiry into her secrets. One year he began hunting mushrooms, and before his curiosity was satisfied had made himself a real expert and learned mycologist in the local field, finding and describing many new species, and all in the midst of the day's work which left no leisure to less ardent spirits.

Once, a few hours after the close of a hard political campaign in which he had been defeated, I found him studying a strange bird through his field glasses. "You see, I have returned to my proper interests in life," he said, with the look of grave sweetness that unlocked all hearts to him. That look was reserved for his rare moments of sheer friendliness; for the most part he had a cheerful smile which exasperated his enemies, to whom he wore it most gaily, almost beyond endurance. Indeed, he was never in higher spirits than when he went into a fight, and it was a forlorn hope so much the better cheer. His courage was undoubted and dauntless, yet he was highly organized and acutely sensitive to pain, and his racing imagination took him through all the suffering before he met it. That kind of physical courage is moral courage, too, and the abuse and accusation which he bore so uncomplainingly, and often returned with such excellent interest, cut him to the quick and brought him home to his family with drawn face and eyes that showed the torments he had gone through.

It was a real genius for friendship that bound so many to him, from the humblest to the highest. The human quality was what his eager feeling sought, and he found and cherished it everywhere. Men such as Judge Bellinger and Asahel Bush, at opposite poles of opinion and character save that both had distinguished intellect and trenchant wit, counted him quite their nearest friend. Children loved him, and I have seen a little boy looking up at him during a cruelly painful minor operation without a wriggle or a murmur while the tears streamed down his little face like rain. And the abundant wealth of return he gave no one who received it will ever cease to treasure. His delight in talk, his power of picturesque, dramatic, humorous realization of scene and circumstance and character made companionship with him an unending joy.

The most notable characteristic of his mind was its unshakable grasp of a few elementary principles of justice and humanity and the sudden and surprising aptness with which he applied them to the case in hand; if to the breaking down of ancient conventions or the shattering of ancient idols, so much the better. From this power of holding fast to the essence amid all the tangle and welter of accident came his flashes of insight as an administrator, when he denied his advisers and defied his enemies—and proved in the end, "in the teeth of all the schools," that he was right. A fighting man with an ingrained love of humanity and of basic, uncomplicated justice is pretty sure to be a success in politics, and he was a fighting man in every fiber.

These simple and obvious qualities were the sole source of his political success. Of the arts of the politician he had none, nor any love of wealth or power. For intrigue and combination he had absolutely no aptitude, and for the complicated team play and strategy necessary to carry through large political programs little enough. But the plain people could not be deceived as to the perfect absence in him of acquisitiveness or any disloyalty to them, the depth and utter sincerity of his feeling for common humanity, and his detestation of privilege and power based on privilege; and for these things they gladly ignored any deficiencies in sustained reasonings or far-reaching programs and elevated him again and again to high place in the face of overwhelming majorities.

It may be that here we come nearest to his inmost secret. As the joy of battle faded with his youth, there grew up beneath the fierce gaiety of the paladin spirit a human kindness and compassion, a yearning over the unfortunate and oppressed, over all mankind, over every living thing, that at last became his master passion. The unwillingness to suffer the human sacrifice to be made was the ground of that last grave decision which seemed so fatally wrong to many of us. Who shall say that it was not best, after all, for some one to overlook the grim and hateful necessities of the hour and fix his gaze on the better things of the future which to us it seems can come only through this sacrifice; that he did not choose for himself a more perfect way when, in this time of "confused noises and garments rolled in blood," he chose rather than applause, rather even than wisdom, to be written down as one who loved his fellow men?

"For life is only a small house . . . and love is an open door."

HARRY LANE, the kindly, courteous gentleman, has gone from among us. He will be long remembered by his friends here, but longest at his home, for—

That best portion of a good man's life,
His little nameless, unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love.

He sleeps peacefully under his native skies, and by his grave there stands as sentinel a mammoth evergreen, as if from the mountains he was wont to look upon and love in his boyhood days.

He is not dead, he has but gone to that—

Country bordering on the land
Sealed in eternal silence here, where all
Are journeying—a region which we call
The empire of the dead. No mortal hand
Hath ever mapped its coast. Upon its strand
Discovery's anchor ne'er hath been let fall.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the changes wrought by the Grim Reaper in this body are swift and startling. They bring home to us the unerring truth that "As for man, his days are as grass; as a flower of the field so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more." Nor does his heavy hand fall alone upon the aged and feeble but often upon the strong and middle aged. Why those whose usefulness seems to have just begun are so often taken we know not. This is one of the mysteries we may solve in the Great Beyond, but now it seems past our finding out.

HARRY LANE—that is what we soon began to call him—came to the Senate unknown to most of us. When he was taken away every heart felt the piercing arrow of sorrow. He had a free, earnest, hearty, sympathetic way about him that commanded not only your confidence but your affection. My acquaintance with him began with his services here. Coming from a neighboring State with interests much in common with those of my own, I soon came to honor and admire his devotion to duty, his earnestness and sincerity, even though I often disagreed with his views.

He was one of the most earnest and sincere men I have ever known, and of rare political courage. He loved humanity. His highest aim seemed to be to serve the poor, the weak, and the lowly and to promote their comfort, welfare, and happiness. His vision of legislation was their wants and needs. His views were often considered radical, but his sincerity of purpose was never doubted.

Although a political partisan he measured all legislation by the people's good and never hesitated to condemn in vigorous and picturesque language party measures which did not meet his views as to what was for the real interests of the people.

Men of his stamp and courage are essential to a republic. The success of representative government depends not only upon the wisdom but upon the courage of those intrusted with authority. A representative should be something more than the mere registrar of an apparent public sentiment. The people at home want something more than this. They want a representative who will think for himself, investigate for himself and have the courage to do what he believes to be for their best interests, even though they may for the moment have a different view from his. They know that they may not have all the information necessary to form a correct judgment as to what ought to be done or as to what ought not to be done. While they, under the impulse of excitement and statements not founded upon fact, may condemn a representative, in their calmer moments they will respect him all the more if they feel that he has acted conscientiously. The man who does his duty as he sees it despite a contrary public sentiment, will have the respect and admiration of all those who admire courage and despise self-seeking. The people expect a representative to study, investigate, and inform himself upon the issues that come before him for action and they expect him to act upon such issues in accordance with his mature and conscientious judgment formed with a due regard for public sentiment and with a knowledge of the many facts and conditions which the people may not know and which, if known, might produce a different sentiment. Such a representative was HARRY LANE. He felt his responsibility as a Senator. He realized his duty as a representative. He wanted to please the people, but above all he was anxious to maintain his own self-respect and do that which was for the people's good and for the welfare and honor of his country. No higher eulogy could be paid any representative. HARRY LANE deserves it. We are better for his life; posterity will be helped through his record of courage and devotion to duty made here.

Mr. PHELAN. You will recall, Mr. President, that William Cullen Bryant, writing in the early part of the nineteenth century and desiring to express the common character and the universality of death, drew his imagery from Oregon. He said:

All that tread
The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom. Take the wings
Of morning, pierce the Barcan wilderness,
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound
Save his own dashings—yet the dead are there!

In order to properly estimate this occasion, we must recall the overwhelming fact that one generation has succeeded and driven out another generation during the entire history of the world, and that death and succession are so common that for the most part they should awaken no surprise. This very body has been decimated by death. I am told that of the 96 men who were Senators 6 years ago, as many as 53 are now numbered among the dead.

We are in the midst of war, which one might suppose would also accentuate the subject of mortality, but, apart from that, it is also true that while war slays her thousands, peace slays her tens of thousands. We all, on reflection, appreciate this fact, and yet, because of the uncertainty of the approach of death—though every man thoughtlessly holds all others mortal except himself—and contrary to what we might suppose to be something of universal acceptance, surprise is constantly experienced. We know from the poet, and the poets are the interpreters of truth and of nature, that the unexpectedness of death is what alarms and astonishes.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set; but all—
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

We know when moons shall wane,
When summer birds from far shall cross the sea,
When autumn's hues shall tinge the golden grain—
But who shall teach us when to look for thee?

Ignorant as we were of the imminence of his fate, it seems that our late colleague had some premonition of death. He departed this Chamber in the midst of his labors to lay his tired bones in his native soil, but it was ordained that he should never reach there. He lingered on the way in California and there he died, and the men and women of California paid due honor to his memory.

While it was not fated that he should die in his own State, yet I am sure that were he to be consulted he would feel that in California, dying, he would not at any rate die among strangers, because his association and his State's associations with California had always been intimate and cordial. As a young man he came to San Francisco to study the profession of medicine, and there in the office of my friend and sometime physician, the late Dr. A. F. Sawyer, he practiced the healing art. After he had perfected himself in his profession he went back, naturally, to his native Oregon to minister to the wants of his own people.

I say there is an intimate association between these two States bordering upon the Pacific. They are contiguous, and it is natural that it be so; but more than that, the common hardships of the pioneers have welded them together and there has been an exchange of courtesies of such a cordial character that it has wedded their fortunes and mingled their fate.

Perhaps the most illustrious man who came out of the West and who sat in this Chamber was Gen. Edward Dickinson Baker, who for many years practiced his profession of the law in San Francisco, and then, looking for a larger field of usefulness where conditions were more favorable and perhaps men more appreciative of his genius and character, he went to Oregon. After a residence there of six months he was elected a Senator of the United States; and this man of wonderful eloquence, marvelous talent, sent by Oregon to this Chamber during the crisis of the Civil War, again felt that his usefulness might be enhanced by laying down the toga and taking up the sword. Commissioned a colonel, he went into the field of death and glory; and very early in his career as a soldier he fell fighting at the battle of Balls Bluff, not far from the National Capital. We of California felt that we had made a contribution to Oregon, as Oregon had made a contribution to the country, in the person of Edward Dickinson Baker. On the other hand, the great singer of the Sierras, Joaquin Miller, spent his early days in Oregon, but for residence chose California; hence his memory is a heritage of the two States. Edwin Markham, "the man with the hoe," also belongs to both Commonwealths. So Oregon and California have been linked not only by their geographical situation and the pioneer strain which bound them both together but also by the public service and poetic achievement of their sons.

Do not mistake this sentiment for provincialism. It is not. Full of that confidence in himself, which often betokens genius, when described by some one in complimentary phrase as "The poet of the Sierras," Miller said, "No, I am the poet of the world." He felt that his services were for humanity just as Baker and LANE felt and Markham feels.

The name of Lane has been a household word in my family, because my parents were thrown in close personal association with Gen. Joseph Lane, HARRY LANE's grandfather, to whom the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has just referred in such eloquent terms, as soldier and statesman. They regarded him always as a chivalrous, brave, and exalted personage, the ideal type of an American. Hence, when I came to the Senate and met for the first time our late colleague, Senator LANE, I felt that there was an old time relationship, coming down from our ancestors, which would, as it turned out to be, incline him favorably to my acquaintance and to a better understanding of all matters which might come before us for consideration. He received me most courteously and kindly. Hence, I am here to-day to pay a tribute to his memory, brief and inadequate though it be.

I not only had this association, but I had other relations with Senator LANE, which endeared him to me and illustrated his character. If his judgment ever failed, I am sure that his heart never faltered.

At the time of the great disaster in San Francisco, just 11 years ago, HARRY LANE was the mayor of Portland, Oreg., and when I called on him, after my election to the Senate, I had his own words for this experience: He raised, he said, as I knew, a very large fund through a committee of his own appointment for the relief of the people of San Francisco. At that time there were 250,000 men and women in the bread line, practically without shelter, and the suffering was very great. One morning he said that it was reported to him that on top of the earthquake and fire there had come a storm, and these poor people, outcasts, their habitations destroyed, and their means of subsistence entirely gone, were exposed to the severity of the elements. When a friend of his came and said, "Why do you not send that money you raised to San Francisco; have you not read of the plight of these people?" He replied, "The money has been sent." This was denied. He then called for his committee, who were invested with the trust, and they said, "No, we have not sent the money, because we do not believe there is an emergency, and we might possibly divert it to some other and better purpose." It was then that Mayor LANE spoke, "This money is in your hands as trustees, contributed by the people of Oregon for a specific purpose; it must be used for that purpose and no other." Then I recalled that he had telegraphed me to know of the emergency, I being the administrator of the relief fund in San Francisco at the time, and on my assurance that there was real need, he demanded, and reiterated his demand, while his reluctant committee hesitated. Finally he said, "Unless this money is remitted to the suffering people of San Francisco at 10 o'clock in the morning, I shall issue a call to the contributors—to the mechanics in their shops and the farmers in their fields, to come with their tools—with their tools, which I shall convert, if necessary, into weapons—and so you gentlemen of smug respectability have a care." The next morning at 10 o'clock the money was remitted to San Francisco.

HARRY LANE was a man who, when he made up his mind that a thing was right, had the courage of his convictions and, though his ways may have been rude, still, as I have said, his heart was always true. He resented the attitude of this committee of his own appointment in deciding that there was no emergency when the world rang of the news of San Francisco's distress.

I went with him just before his departure from Washington to the President of the United States to ask for a pardon for a citizen of Oregon with whose affairs I was thoroughly familiar, and of whose innocence he and I were convinced. When the Attorney General said, "There is no adequate reason for pardon on the face of the record," it seemed as though the matter might well be abandoned as hopeless; but, in examining the case—Senator LANE, Senator CHAMBERLAIN, the senior Senator from Oregon, and I—we found that even the record revealed, what we knew, that there was no turpitude in the offense; that it was a jury's blunder. A loving father of happy children, a man guiltless of crime but technically enmeshed by the law, was in peril.

Senator LANE told the President that it would be an insult to the law to hold the man under the color of law, and that justice was more important than legality. Quoting Burke, he said, in effect, the meanest creature who crawls the earth, calling for justice, is an object respectable in the eyes of God and man. The President, let me say to the credit of his generous understanding, yielded to that plea.

So my associations with Senator LANE have been of such a character that I sincerely mourn his loss. With that great train of pioneers, led by his illustrious ancestor, Gen. Joseph Lane, he has gone to his final account. The poet, so identified with both our States, California and Oregon, sings of the fatalism of the pioneer, always hoping against hope, until he dimly saw "outcroppings of gold in the stars." Just as our colleague, through the dreary debates of this body, hoped against hope possibly that some good would come out of it all. He was impatient of delay; he loved to be direct. He contributed his criticism, if you please, of some of our proceedings, and which we must, as the senior Senator from Oregon has told you, regard as the sincere expressions of the man and, indeed, helpful in the final determination of questions under consideration, because where there is unanimity in a deliberative body the truth is rarely evoked. Senator LANE, with honest purpose, precipitated discussion and forced deliberation.

He was weary and, perhaps, disappointed in many things, but was always, like his pioneer comrades, confident and cheerful.

We have worked our claims, we have spent our gold,
Our barks are astrand on the bars;
We are battered and old, yet at night we behold
Outcroppings of gold in the stars.

May HARRY LANE realize, and may those outcroppings of gold in the stars lead him to his eternal treasure and heavenly reward. His vexed spirit is now at rest, and—

"After life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, my relations with HARRY LANE were so close, my affection for him so great, my grief at his taking off so intense, that I speak with difficulty concerning him. As has been suggested by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the great Reaper seems especially busy in the Halls of Congress. So often have we met to offer our tribute to departed brethren that it no longer is an unusual event.

Life is a strange affair after all. Whether we dwell upon the mountain peaks of aspiration, in the valleys of despondency, or in the yesterdays of our sorrows, we understand it not, and the strangest fact of life is death.

Our flowers are generally reserved for death, and the thorns are bestowed in life. And so we come to speak the words of love and praise for him who needed them yesterday, but needs them not to-day.

To those who knew not HARRY LANE what is uttered here to-day by his friends may seem an exaggeration. To them all words seem feeble to portray his virtues. I know of him in private life only by what has been told me, and therefrom I gather that the characteristics of this wonderful man were the same in private as in public life, namely, kindness and courage.

Sometimes we seem to think that courage and kindness can not walk hand in hand as common virtues. Sometimes one would think that braggadocio was an indication of courage. But it will always remain true that

The bravest are the tenderest;
The loving are the daring.

Balzac has painted the character of the country doctor and his goodness. True it is, that to the physician is given more opportunity for kindness possibly than to others.

HARRY LANE was the poor folks' doctor. They loved him. He was kind to them. There was no horizon to his charity.

The great Teacher of men loved the poor and they "heard Him gladly."

Lincoln once said "God loved the common people. That is why He made so many of them."

HARRY LANE knew them, their wants, hopes, desires, lives, and it was his great ambition to minister unto them. He was to them a brother man.

I have been told of the incident when his body lay in state in the Masonic Temple at Portland and little ragged newsboys came in to pay him their last tribute. One little, dirty, ragged fellow said to the other: "Boy, he was sure good to us; he was the best friend we kids ever had."

A story of human trouble, of suffering, of fallen women trying to rise, brought the tears to his eyes and from him an offer to help.

He was ever ready to throw the rope to the girl going down, without inquiring as to her character.

He believed there was goodness in the souls of the fallen.

He had the tenderness of a child and the courage of a lion.

He, of all men, would not want us to exaggerate his virtues.

In his simple, honest way, he would shrink from praise.

He had faults, of course, as he was a human being.

He loved little children. One who loves and is kind to children is fit for the immortal home. "For of such is the kingdom of heaven."

The Recording Angel must have been busy writing in the great Judgment Book the kindly deeds of HARRY LANE, and if now and then was recorded a fault, looking down upon all his devotion to humanity, he must have blotted out the record of those faults with his tears.

In public life he typified courage to the extent that few men have in our Nation's history.

He was the uncompromising foe of graft, great or small; likewise of greed.

He despised those who, in Congress or elsewhere, voted to assist special privilege. The representatives of special privilege despised him, and he was rather proud that they did, but they despised him not one bit more than he did them. They had no difficulty in understanding his attitude. Hypocrisy did not dwell in his nature. Candor was ever present with him.

No one questioned his fidelity to those whom he represented. He was no trimmer and no quitter in a fight. No one accused him of talking at home for the things the people wanted and voting here for the things they did not want.

He did not spend five years of his term serving "invisible government" and one year before election serving the people.

He was not a forward-looking man when a candidate, and a backward-looking man after election. The HARRY LANE after election differed not a particle from the HARRY LANE before election.

He did not consider it a great honor to carry the incense jars and burn incense for those who sneered at all reform and all battles for the general welfare of the everyday people.

He despised the lick-spittle sycophantism so often seen in Congress.

No caucus bound him. No one told him how to vote. He had only one master—his conscience. One desire—service for his country.

He did not know that the word "coward" was a part of our language.

I have believed the strength of HARRY LANE's character was due somewhat to his love of nature. He had lived in God's glorious out of doors; out where there are Sermons in stones,

Books in babbling brooks,
And good in everything.

Living in that great Golden West he loved to roam by the streams, along the trails with the rod and the gun, and, as daylight melted into darkness, to smoke his pipe at the camp fire with no canopy but the starlighted heavens. From such scenes he drew inspiration and a certain homely philosophy of life.

He learned from the dizzy mountain heights and from the mighty deep. The mountains gave him wide vision; the sea much understanding. Little wonder that those things developed character and courage. Such a character as his would lead him to death for his convictions, and in fact he died for them, crucified by that part of the press devoted to invisible government aided by some of the very people he loved, and for whom he would have given his life, and who understood him not, he went to his death a martyr to his fixed convictions.

Such lives, however, do not really die. They live on in the hearts of thousands left behind. Wherever the songs of the sweet singer of Israel are read, David still liveth. To those who venerate law, Moses is not dead. Nor in the lives of free men who have come from darkness into light can the memory of Abraham Lincoln ever pass away. And so, in the hearts of the many who have been cheered and helped by his life, HARRY LANE will live on.

Truly can we say of him, this world is a little better place because he lived.

He approached death with the same courage that sustained him through life, and well he might. For him death had no terror. He met it with a smile.

When the bark of his life loosed its moorings and floated out with the tide upon that sea where no sail is ever homeward bound, it carried to that beautiful isle of somewhere—that isle where the sun always shines, where sorrow knoweth no home—as true a soul as God ever sent to earth.

I have in vision sometimes pictured that soul as the Judgment Book was opened and the Master read and told him what he had done in life for Him, and in astonishment he must have exclaimed, "Lord, when did I this," and then the glorious response: "Here is the record of help to little children, of service unmeasured to the poor, of pains alleviated, of kind words spoken to the fallen, of encouragement given to the man steeped in crime, of the ropes thrown to those sinking in a sea of trouble, of financial help to the mother bending her back over the washtub, of work secured for strong but unfortunate fathers, of meat given to the hungry, of drink given to the thirsty, of refuge given to the stranger, of clothing given to the naked, of visitation to the sick and to those in prison"; and then I can, in a vision, hear the King say unto him, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me"; and with the righteous such a soul passes on into life eternal.

It was hard for those of us who loved him as a friend to have him part from us. It seemed as if we could not let him go. The only comfort to me was in that hope of immortality, firm in my heart, that somewhere, some place, on some other shore, he would be waiting with outstretched hands to greet and welcome us. And there came to me, as some consolation, the beautiful words of the Christian's prayer:

Good night, beloved; blessed be thy rest.
Come lay thy head upon the Savior's breast.
We loved thee well, but Jesus loved thee best.
Good night, good night, good night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is about to call to preside the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. In leaving, it must not be misunderstood that I go other than as compelled to go to meet an engagement which was made before I knew of these memorial services. Everybody knows that I was HARRY LANE's friend and that HARRY LANE was mine. Our friendship did not depend on his views or on my views; I knew he was an honest man, and he thought I was one. So long as the Senate of the United States shall be composed of honest men and men we think are honest, thank God, the Republic will be safe and the memory of LANE will be secure.

He has gone like a morsel of incense burned in the halls of eternity, but the odorous cloud wafted ever upward to the rafters of Heaven. Rest to his ashes and peace to his soul.

Mr. KING assumed the chair.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, when death laid its inexorable hand upon the arm of HARRY LANE and led him to his final resting place, it took from the Senate a unique figure and a good, useful, and able Senator.

I was denied the privilege of knowing Senator LANE until shortly before my term of office began and so my all too brief acquaintance with him spans only two years. I know that I, whose acquaintance with him has been so short, can but inadequately give testimony to his character, accomplishments, and life attainments. This must be left to others who were privileged to know him longer and, therefore, are more familiar with his worth and works than I could possibly be. I can only speak of him as I saw and knew him here in the Senate. But in those two years I learned to know him well enough to warmly appreciate his fine qualities of mind and heart and to conceive for him a warm affection and a high respect.

Senator LANE died in the afternoon of life. And his was a busy and eventful one. He died rich in accomplishments, rich in attainments, and rich in service. Of such a life much history could and, no doubt, will be written by others. But in turning to the Congressional Directory all that we find of self-recorded testimony of himself is simply this: "HARRY LANE, Democrat;" silent as to the deeds of his own busy and successful career and absent all self-laudation or self-praise. He bequeaths to us but his own characterization of himself as an index to his inner self. These words might well serve for his epitaph.

HARRY LANE was indeed a Democrat in the truest and highest sense of the word. He was a Democrat politically, but there are none in the Senate upon whom the cloak of party regularity hung more loosely. He did not hesitate to oppose his party or to vote against its measures when his conscience or his sense of duty bade him do so. He was independent in thought and action, and never hesitated to support what he thought was right and to oppose what he thought was wrong, and this without regard to what others thought or as to whether it was for or against the interests of his party or of his own political welfare. He was fearless as well as independent. All that he feared was doing wrong and all that he ever reached and strove for was doing right. Whatever errors he may have committed—and these were fewer, I believe, than those ordinarily chargeable against most men—were of the head and not of the heart. I doubt not he was so in everything. He was democratic in his manners and in his mental and spiritual make-up. Like Henry George, he was for men. He was intensely human himself. None was more approachable, more unassuming, more affable, more genial, or more kindly. Within a very short time I felt as though I had known him for years. He was candid and ingenuous and his mind and his heart were as an open book. He had nothing to conceal and concealed nothing. He was a man of the broadest of sympathies and he loved his fellow men. I served with him on the Committee on Indian Affairs and had full opportunity to become familiar with this phase of his disposition and nature. He was jealous of the rights of the Indians, and opposed with all the power within him everything that to him smacked of wrong or injustice to them. His speeches in the Senate on Indian affairs evidence that his jealous care and solicitude for the welfare of the Indians amounted to a passion. By his death the Indians have lost one of their most loyal and devoted friends.

He was the implacable foe of wrong, injustice, and oppression no matter when or where or in what manner or shape it might appear. He could not help it. It was ingrained in the very fiber of his being. He was a friend of the poor and the helpless and the oppressed, and withal free from demagoguery of any sort. He hated sham, fraud, and hypocrisy. With rare skill in debate, he uncovered and exposed at every opportunity these to the eye in all their nakedness. His speech on the oleomargarine bill, delivered on February 22 of this year, ranks, in my opinion, with the best speeches made in the Senate since I have been a Member. It bristles with wit, wisdom, and logic, and, while attacking what he conceived to be the vices in the measure, his genial and lovable personality shines through it all and takes away the sting of what he says.

HARRY LANE was spiritually democratic. He was charitable toward all men and harbored malice toward none. His heart was incapable of cherishing personal hatred or meanness. His love for his fellow men was all absorbing and all embracing. Underlying and around everything that he did or said was the unselfish motive of helping and uplifting his fellow men.

Senator LANE was a most interesting conversationalist. He was well read and possessed a fund of interesting information. He possessed the saving grace of humor, which was as delightful as it was infectious. His entire absence of love of self or vanity in any form was best illustrated by the fact that he enjoyed a joke on himself. He frequently related, with a great deal of evident pleasure and gusto, ridiculous and laughable incidents in which he was the central figure, never failing to arouse at his own expense the mirth of his auditors.

Senator LANE was patriotic. He loved his country; he loved its institutions; he loved its democracy. Just a few days before he left on what was to be his final earthly journey, his last thought was in regard to legislation calculated to relieve the poor people of the country, and to increase the supplies of the Nation. His last thought, as expressed to me, was his desire that something should be done to prepare the country more adequately in the way of food supplies during this war.

Mr. President, I believe that the atmosphere of the Senate has been purer and sweeter because of his membership. I believe the world is better because of HARRY LANE. When he died his State and his country lost an honest, able, and patriotic Senator and his death is sincerely mourned by all who were associated with him in this Chamber. We miss his cheery presence, his kindly handclasp and his pleasant word. His country and his State will miss a man who may be called without exaggeration a thoroughly good man; a man whose heart was without guile, whose thoughts were pure and noble, whose purposes were patriotic, lofty, and unselfish; a man whose passion was to serve his fellow men; a man who demanded nothing for himself, but only wished to give to others; a man who looked for no opportunity to serve himself, but who only sought the opportunity to serve others. All will sorely miss and mourn HARRY LANE, Democrat.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the death of Senator LANE is almost a tragedy. His life was devoted to the relief of those who are unfortunate, to the purification of governmental affairs, and to the elimination of graft and dishonorable practices from public office. He had great respect and often admiration for those who honestly disagreed with him on public questions, but he despised with a hatred that was intense the public official or the private citizen who was untrue to his own conscientious convictions. He never compromised with what he believed to be false or wrong. To the policy of partisan political control of governmental action he gave no heed. He decided from such information as he had and such investigation as he could make what was the proper thing to do, and then he adhered to that course with a steadfastness and an energy that knew no cessation or deviation.

When the war broke out in Europe he was extremely anxious that our Government should remain strictly neutral. He was opposed to any step being taken that might by any possibility entangle us in the great conflict. He believed it was America's duty to hold aloof, although he often said that if we wanted to be technical we could find sufficient excuse to get into the controversy on either side. He was bitterly opposed to the passage of a law giving to the President the right to arm merchant ships with guns and gunners from our Navy. He believed that such a course must inevitably plunge us into the war, and according to his judgment no sufficient cause existed for the taking of such a step. He believed also that undue Executive influences were being used for the purpose of the passage of such a law, and he thought that the evil of Executive coercion over functions of the Legislature were nearly as great as participation in the war itself. With him there was nothing personal in this judgment. To him it was a fundamental proposition and upon it he refused to compromise in any degree.

He had almost unlimited confidence in the President. His faith in him was unbounded. While he sometimes disagreed with the Chief Executive as to the policy to be pursued by our Government, his love and admiration for the President were unshaken. He had given to him great credit for marking the course of our ship of State along a neutral channel, which he believed was the only safe and honorable course to pursue. In the campaign which had just preceded he had taken an active interest. He had campaigned among the great masses of his people on the Pacific coast, and pleaded with them for the reelection of the President, principally on the ground that he had kept our country out of the terrible war, and that his reelection meant continued neutrality and peace for our people. When Congress was asked to pass the bill providing for so-called "armed neutrality," by giving the President the authority to use the guns and men of our Navy upon merchant ships, his sensibilities were terribly shocked. He readily recognized that there were two sides to the question, and he found no fault with the conscientious man who disagreed with him on this proposition. He felt, however, that such a course, for him at least, would be deceptive, and that such action on his part would not be fair to the people whom he knew had confidence in him, and who had listened to his plea for continued peace; and when, after that memorable fight ended, he was denounced by men in public life whom he loved, by friend and foe alike, as an enemy to his country, it well-nigh broke his heart. He knew that in his opposition to that measure he had carried out the promptings of his own soul, to remain true to the doctrines he had proclaimed, and in which he honestly believed. Following this, he was criticized and condemned unmercifully by a large portion of the press of the country, and particularly by the leading newspapers of his own State. So bitter was this denunciation, and so far was it carried, that not only was his own patriotism denied but the loyalty of his ancestors was without cause, without reason, and regardless of truth vehemently and persistently questioned.

Many of his former friends joined in his condemnation, and because of the unanimity of the press, controlled, he believed, by the enemies of good government, he was unable to reach the great masses of the people whom he believed he was properly representing, and whose interests alone he had nearest to his heart. He was used to criticism, and he never objected to it as long as it was fair and emanated from sources and from people honestly believing that such criticism was just, but when the sources of communication between him and those he served were controlled, and he was unable to make any defense before his own people, and when his motives and his patriotism were questioned, especially by those whom he loved and in whom he had unbounded confidence, the despair of his honest heart was so great and the agony of his blighted hope so severe that he never recovered his former self.

Within a few weeks he was a physical wreck. Those who knew him best became alarmed at his condition. He alone remained tranquil and serene. Before he came to the Senate he had been a physician for many years and had reached an eminent position among his associates in that profession. His trained mind told him that death was near, but during those few weeks that followed he never once expressed a fear or showed any hesitancy to meet the end that he knew was but a few steps in advance. During those days, after he had become so weak that he could scarcely walk, and when it was not safe for him to ride in a street car, I often rode with him in a taxicab from his office to his home.

At his request, I spent many evenings alone with him in his home. He talked of the approaching end in the same half-humorous way that he met all the serious questions that confront us all. There was at no time any hesitancy or any fear. He talked of death in the same humorous vein in which he often spoke in the Senate,—a humor that his friends knew was always pointed, and always conveyed an idea and a lesson. He approached the end with the same demeanor, the same calmness, and in the same spirit that he went about his daily work. He looked death in the face with calmness and with a smile, the same as he met his friends in daily life. He never knew fear, either moral or physical, during his long busy life, and he walked as it were, to his open grave, with the same serenity and the same calmness that marked his every act. There was no thought of self, but only a fervent hope that the poor and unfortunate, for whom he had lived his entire life, might be relieved of all possible suffering and distress. I think he was satisfied with his life's work. In his last hours, nothing gave him more pleasure than to tell of some poor unfortunate, whom he had helped and whom he had placed on the road to happiness and success. Of him it can truly be said that he approached his grave

Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Senator LANE as I have said, had attained eminence in his profession. He had been elected and served with distinction as President of the Oregon Medical Association. He had gained a reputation as a physician that extended far beyond the city where he lived. The making of money, however, was one of his least thoughts. He loved his profession for the good it enabled him to do for those who were sick and unfortunate. He had a very large clientele among the poor, and as illustrating the man's heart and character, it might be related that after he knew his days were numbered and that life's span was about over, he took his accounts and books containing evidences of indebtedness amounting to several thousands of dollars against people, the majority of whom were poor, and threw them into the fire, remarking as he did so, that while many of them could well afford to pay, there were hundreds who could not do so without hardship, and he wanted no administrator of his estate annoying those whose poverty made it difficult for them to live and support those dependent upon them in comfort and happiness.

He was known among the poorer classes as the "Little Doctor." There were many who did not even know his name, hundreds who did not even know him by sight, who knew that in the "Little Doctor" suffering humanity had a true and unfaltering friend. But his reputation extended to other classes also, and his absolute fearlessness and his ability to turn a serious situation into one of humor is well illustrated by one of the many incidents that happened in his busy professional life where he was called upon to attend a professional gambler who was in an extremely dangerous condition. The gambler had sent for the "Little Doctor" because he had faith in his professional ability. He knew that he had always fought against gambling and all other forms of vice and that he was a bitter enemy of corruption and sin. The sick man did not improve as he thought he ought to. Some of his associates who visited him suggested that the "Little Doctor" would probably not do his utmost to save the life of a professional gambler and that his hatred of their business might even induce him to take a professional course with such a patient that would ultimately bring about certain death. The next time the doctor called on his patient the gambler pulled a revolver out from under the covering, pointed it at the doctor, and calmly told him that if he did not promise on his honor to use his professional skill to the very utmost to cure him he would shoot him on the spot; and to impress the doctor with his desperate character and the firmness of his determination he said, "I want you to understand, Doctor, that I have already killed two men." The cold, gray eyes of Dr. LANE looked into the muzzle of the revolver, the firm lines around his mouth relaxed as a smile spread over his countenance, and without hesitancy he replied, "You claim to be a desperate man and can boast of having killed but two men. Why, that is nothing; I have killed hundreds of them."

The funeral of Senator LANE, in the city of Portland, demonstrated the love and affection in which he was held by the great mass of common people, who knew him and knew of him. For miles, the funeral procession slowly wound its way through streets that were crowded and packed with the saddened faces of those who knew best of his life's work. Their admiration for him seemed to be unbounded, the sorrow that was manifested can not be measured. Men and women came from all over the State of Oregon to attend this funeral. In the few moments that I had to mingle with the crowd, I talked with three different people who came 150 miles to be present on this occasion. Not one of them had ever seen Senator LANE. They knew him by reputation only. They knew that he always stood for what in his own heart he believed to be right, and that during his whole life, he had always been fighting an uphill fight for those who were oppressed. They knew that when they attended his funeral, they would not be able to gain admission to the temple where the services were held. They knew that in all likelihood, they would not be able even to look upon the face of the man whom they honored and loved. They knew that all they could do would be to stand on the sidewalk, and with bowed heads, watch the procession as it passed by. They knew that no gain could come to them in a material or a financial way by making the sacrifices necessary to make the trip, but they wanted to do something to show their love and admiration for the man who had lived and died for humanity's cause. They were satisfied to be permitted to visit the last resting place of the man in whom they had unbounded confidence, and for whose memory they had unmeasured love.

And so it was, that beneath the spreading branches of the ancient cedar, in Lone Fir Cemetery, we laid to rest all that was mortal of HARRY LANE. Hundreds of his admirers whom he never knew visited this spot day after day, for weeks after the funeral, and brought fragrant flowers of remembrance to deposit upon the fresh mound. The spot where he lies is almost sacred in the true hearts of many thousands, who knew his work and loved him for it.

It is said that in ancient times the old warrior Abou Ben Adhem was once awakened in the night, and as he opened his eyes, he saw an angel writing in a book. The brave old warrior asked the angel, "What are you writing there?" The angel replied, "I am writing the names of those who love the Lord."

"Is my name written there?"

The angel replied, "No," and then spake Ben Adhem:

"I pray you write my name as one who loves his fellow man."

The angel wrote and vanished, and the next night Ben Adhem was again awakened by the presence of the same angel, and in his hand he bore a flaming scroll, containing the names of those who love the Lord, and behold Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

If men are to be recompensed in the great beyond for the good they do here, if deeds of kindness are to be rewarded there, if conscientious action and honest conviction of heart are in the life beyond to be rewarded, and if those who serve man best are in reality those who serve God best, then high up on the list of honor in the eternal book of fame, shining with a glory and a luster that shall continue undimmed through all eternity, will be the name of HARRY LANE, and around that new-made grave in that ancient and beautiful cemetery, if there could be assembled that unnumbered multitude, each of whom has through some act or some deed of Senator LANE been relieved of some burden or has been taught by him the way to a higher and a nobler life, there would be a unanimous voice repeating the immortal words that were said of him who died on Strato's sword:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, this is a solemn moment and calls for serious thought. It is a time set apart by the Senate to take an inventory, as it were, of a well-spent life and to pay the tribute of our love and respect to the memory of an honored Member of this body. The value of the tribute which has been paid to Senator LANE by the Senators who have spoken can not be measured in gold or earthly honors. It is the priceless reward which a brave, free people always give to the man who under all circumstances dares to do that which he believes to be right.

Mr. President, I believe the most useful lessons are the lessons learned from other lives. The most valuable assets in the business of a nation are the moral qualities and the intellectual acquirements of the men and women who compose its citizenship. I also believe in the immortality of good deeds and the moral potentiality of a noble example. There is nothing that the present generation should preserve and guard more carefully than the memory of heroic achievements, the self-sacrifices and patriotic efforts of those who have directed the Nation's affairs and contributed to the formation of that compelling force called public sentiment, to which we are indebted for the preservation of American institutions.

As the beacon light that flashes across the turbulent waters of the trackless sea marks the way and enables the mariner to follow the channel and avoid the breakers, so the conduct and character of those who precede us along the highway of life point the way of duty and enable us to avoid the pitfalls into which other peoples have fallen.

I shall not, on this occasion, undertake to give a biographical sketch of our distinguished late colleague who has felt the chill of the world's disaster, loitered for a while in the valley between the peaks of two eternities, and then permitted the privilege of moving on to the realm of unchanging Verities, where Truth is the law and immutable Justice sits enthroned. It was not my privilege to know Senator LANE intimately. My acquaintance with him dates from the time I became a member of this body four years ago, and my relations with him were almost exclusively of an official character. I did not agree with him on some of the public questions which engaged the attention of this body, but there was something so ruggedly honest, so unselfishly patriotic, so splendidly altruistic in every act of his official and private life that came under my observation, that I was soon drawn close to him in admiration and love.

I was also impressed with the unique fact that he was endeavoring always to serve others, rather than himself. When a public question came up for consideration he never asked whether it was popular or unpopular. All he desired to know was: Is it right—is it best for the Nation—best for the great silent, slow-thinking multitude whose interests legislators are especially commissioned to protect. His love for the lowly was a divine passion. When he determined upon a course of duty he never faltered. There was a sublime pertinacity of purpose which characterized his official conduct that challenged the admiration even of his political opponents. The shafts of slander did not deter him—the poisoned dagger in the hands of the literary assassin had no terror for him—and the sneers of the ranting verbal snobs and vicious official sycophants rather amused him. He was strong enough to stand alone, which is the acid test of true greatness.

I am told, however, that in his last days, on account of physical illness, and when his dauntless spirit lagged in sympathy with his dying body, that the cruel criticisms heaped upon him by a mercenary press wounded deeply his sensitive soul. But it did not swerve him from his course. He did his duty as God gave him the power to understand his duty.

Mr. President, there was a moral magnitude in the make-up of this man which was an inspiration to me. I wish the youth of America might know him as I understood him. His life would be an inspiring example, a tonic, a moral stimulant to those who find it difficult under the stress of an emergency, and the influence of sordid selfishness, to do right.

I do not think that one could form a correct estimate of Senator LANE's character by the larger things, measured by the world's standard, which he did. But it was rather by the smaller, the apparently inconsequential, everyday things that make up one's life. It was in those little things that he appeared at his best, and from that sphere of life he received the inspiration which took form in deeds.

When the prophet Elijah stood on the mountain side to look for some token of divine will, he did not get it in the tempest or the earthquake or the fire of conflict. But he heard it in the "still, small voice" which reached his ears after those had passed. We have heard the storm of political debate, the vitriolic utterances of the war-mad statesmen; we have felt the earthquake and shock of a world war; we have seen the fire of legislative persecution—indeed, we are in the midst of it all to-day. And in this vortex of blood and plunder, with the voice of the "patriotism of hate" ringing in our ears and the lust for gain poisoning the souls of our people, we should, above all things and above all times, hearken to the "still, small voice" which speaks to our consciences in the articulate words of the Constitution, from the graves of our fathers, who sealed their faith with their sacred blood. From that high source alone we shall receive the truth of sufficient potency to save the Nation. The ears of Senator LANE were ever sensitive to such a call. His great, big, patriotic, loving heart always responded to such a demand.

The difference between the real statesman and the timeserver will be shown by the power to look through the mist and smoke arising from the conflict which rages in the unhappy present, into the quiet and peaceful state which marks the restoration of order.

Our war is not only with a foreign enemy, but there is a war raging within our own hearts.

Man who man would be
Must rule the empire of himself: in it
Must be supreme, establishing his throne
On vanquished will, quelling the anarchy
Of hopes and fears, being himself alone.

We can not fathom the infinite mind or understand the dispensation of Providence. I have thought that Senator LANE would have been a safe counselor in the hour of reconstruction, after the whirlwind of war shall have passed over our beloved country. There are times when I would rather trust the promptings of a loving heart than the processes of the keenest intellect. But "He who doeth all things well" has ordered otherwise, and I shall not question the works of Providence.

In the shadow of a great national sorrow and a world catastrophe, I have hope that,

Out of the twilight of the past
We move to a diviner light;
For nothing that is wrong can last;
Nothing's immortal but the right.

It may cost enormously in blood and treasure, but truth and justice will ultimately triumph.

For those who by the ties of a close kinship are called upon to suffer the pangs of an eternal separation, I have not words with which to express the depth of my love, sympathy, and condolence. Peace to his ashes and rest to the immortal soul of this noble man.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who has been called away at this time and is unable to be present, I will read to the Senate the tribute which he has prepared, and which he has asked me to present at this time.

Senator GRONNA says of former Senator LANE:

"I first became acquainted with Senator LANE after he had taken his seat in the Senate some five years ago. It so happened that Senator LANE and I were assigned to serve on the Committees on Claims and on Indian Affairs, and I think I may say that it is generally known among members of Congress that the work of these two committees is not only the most arduous, but perplexing, of any of our standing committees. This is especially true with reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs. There seems to be a feeling among the Indians of the country, both those who are still the wards of the Nation and those who have been declared competent, that this is a forum where they have the right to be heard. The members of that committee constantly hear complaints and protests from helpless people, and especially from the Indians who are still the Nation's wards.

"The members of the Senate, as well as the members of the House, in making up their choice of committees, as a rule do not select the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I have heard it stated that the reason why the members are reluctant to serve on this committee is the fact that one must always deal with the unfortunate and oppressed Indian. But Senator LANE did not seem to look at it from that viewpoint. To him it seemed a real pleasure, because before that committee he had the opportunity to work out great problems in the interest and for the benefit of a helpless class of people; and very soon after he had been assigned to this committee he showed not only his love for all mankind, but his hatred against granting special privileges to the strong for the oppression of the weak and unfortunate.

"HARRY LANE was an earnest student of nature. He loved to delve into its secrets. It soon became manifest that Senator LANE was intensely interested in the welfare of these helpless people. He knew the Indian as very few men know and understand him. He had studied his characteristics, good and bad, his strong as well as his weak points. He had the courage to champion the cause of these oppressed people, even to the extent of breaking with his party friends, if that were necessary.

"Although my first experience with Senator LANE was rather puzzling, I soon discovered his powerful intellect, his pungent wit, and his ability to judge men. No one could fail to observe his pleasing characteristics, and, although he was plain in his appearance, his features were striking. During my services in Congress I have never met a man more genial, witty, and humorous than Senator LANE. But while he possessed wit and humor, he was also intensely earnest in his work. He fearlessly fought against oppression wherever he found it. He believed that the natural resources should belong to the people, and that any law enacted which would deny them this right, was not a good law.

"Senator LANE was industrious and very attentive to his duties, and few men in the Senate have rendered more efficient service, or accomplished more, if as much, during the first years of their service, as was accomplished by him. He possessed an indomitable will, unflinching courage, and an earnest desire to do right; and while his natural temperament was that of valor, gallantry, and firmness, he possessed a heart as sympathetic and tender as that of a child.

"For a new Senator, he made a number of speeches, but he never spoke except upon subjects in which he was deeply interested. His speeches upon child labor, pure food, and Indian affairs are classics, and will perhaps be more appreciated in the future than they are now.

"He always insisted that public officials were but servants of the people, and should be compelled to act accordingly.

"He hated sham and pretension; despised flattery, and was quick to discern the real from the unreal, the true from the false. He was one of those gallant and brave warriors who have struggled throughout the centuries to make a better world for the common people to live in, and it is in the memory of the common people that he will stand out as one of God's noblemen.

"During my acquaintance with HARRY LANE I never saw him despondent or discouraged over anything affecting himself, or his own interests; but he was deeply concerned and often worried about legislation which he believed would be beneficial to his people, and especially to the poor.

"No man will be able to preach a eulogy such as the deeds of HARRY LANE deserve. His dauntless courage, his unselfish, humane, and beneficent work in the interest of humanity will be the most conspicuous and lasting monument to him; his own deeds enshrined in the hearts of his people will be the real living memorial sacred to his memory."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] prepared a few remarks which he intended to deliver, but he has been called away from the city, and it was impossible for him to attend this morning. I should like to comply with his request to have them printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, in accordance with a time-honored custom of the Senate, we have met here to-day to give expression of our respect and love for a departed Member and co-worker, Hon. HARRY LANE, late of the State of Oregon. While I do not know of anything that I could say which would add to his memory, willingly do I respond to the call to say a few words at this time, weak though they may be, in regard to his life as I knew him.

My acquaintance with Senator LANE began in the winter of 1914, when I came to Washington to assume my official duties. That is not a long time as marked by years; but I have worked many days and months with him on the Senate floor and various committees, and, I believe, learned to know him well. My admiration and respect for him increased as time passed. He was a consistent and tireless worker, possessed of that strong and rare quality of always having the courage of his convictions. He loved sincerity, hated hypocrisy, and had no place in his conception of the ideals of men for the demagogue. He lived a simple, homely life, yet he lived a life of luxury—the luxury of doing good for others. He was the champion of the rights of mankind, a true friend of the oppressed, the poor, and the needy; and yet, in the midst of his usefulness, he was taken away. We can seek his counsel and advice no more.

The Scriptures tell us that all who live must die and those who die will live again. I do not know what reward awaits him in the next world for the good things he has done here, but I do know that for all good deeds performed on this earth we have our just reward—the reward of having conscientiously done our duty as we see it, and I am sure he had his.

Senator LANE was a man who always gave freely of his knowledge and means to all in need. He will be greatly missed by those of us who knew him. He possessed to a marked degree the three greatest precepts of man—obedience to God, loyalty to friends, and fidelity to family. He never knowingly did an act that was intended to deceive or injure anyone, while his life, as we knew him, was marked with candor and sincerity.

My friends, the loss of such a man in public life is a real misfortune to the Nation. At home his death is looked upon by his friends and neighbors with genuine sorrow and regret, and to his wife and family, whose happiness he had ever in mind, his departure is most distressing and almost unbearable, and as we assemble here to-day to honor and pay tribute to his memory our hearts go out to them who were left behind, those who were so dear to him.

May the Great Ruler in His divine wisdom comfort them and be with them always.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator, I move that the Senate adjourn until Tuesday, September 18, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 18, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, September 17, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for that irresistible influence which is ever drawing us to Thee, that the Holy of Holies is always open to Thy children where they may receive light, strength, courage, to guide, uphold, and sustain them in the duties Thou hast imposed upon them. Hence we come to Thee in faith and confidence, praying for the things Thou seest we need, that Thy benediction may be upon us, that we may be faithful servants unto the duties of this day, in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 15, 1917, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, had insisted upon its amendments, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. STONE, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. SMOOT as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. POINDEXTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message from the Senate also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. HARRY LANE, late a Senator from the State of Oregon.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public service.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

INVITATION TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO VISIT THE BRITISH FRONTS.

The SPEAKER. Last Saturday, when the Chair laid before the House a telegram from the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Lord Chancellor, he neglected or forgot to refer it at all. It is referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5949.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5949, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa.: For additional amount for a primer shop and planning room, $35,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, just before adjournment on Saturday there was a very interesting discussion in regard to these 10 per cent commission contracts. Now, there has been a good deal of talk floating around about these contracts. I myself have heard several specific instances cited; and while they are hearsay, nevertheless it is perfectly true that this sort of a contract gives every temptation to the sort of thing that is being talked about.

For instance, a physician here in Washington told me that he was talking with another physician, and the second physician told him that a patient of his said to him, "Doctor, I have got the softest snap I ever had. I am getting $60 a week from a contractor who has a contract with the Government." The doctor said, "That is pretty good. What are you doing?" He said, "I do not do anything except keep out of the way of the Government inspector, and that is not very hard."

Another case that came to my attention was that of a man who was not a carpenter by trade, but who was more or less handy with tools. He got a position as carpenter on one of these cantonments at $7.50 a day as carpenter and $15 a day on Sundays and on holidays, and while they were working some one came along and said, "Don't hurry, boys."

Now, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said, as the result of what was brought out by a member of the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson], while this is all hearsay evidence, and while we all trust that there are few, if any, such cases that elude Government inspection, nevertheless this sort of contract does offer every inducement and temptation to the contractor to put unnecessary men on the pay roll if it is going to help him to make it easier for himself in the community in which he lives or works and to pay an excessive price for supplies and labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt whatever but that there has been an honest effort made by the administration generally to do away with inordinate war profits and to obtain supplies for the Government at the lowest possible price. Take the case of clothing. I was talking with an officer who visited me the other day, and he was telling me what he paid for his overcoat. It is an overcoat that any Member of this House would have to pay $35 or $40 for, and yet he bought it at the commissary department for a little over $9. The shoes which have been furnished to the soldiers for $2.50 or $2.60 are a kind of shoes that Members of this House would have to pay $5 or $6 or even $7 for in the open market. Now, the manufacturers who are making clothing and shoes for our Army are not getting inordinate profits. In some of our manufacturing cities manufacturers have taken contracts to supply clothing for the Army at very reasonable prices, but their men are being bought away from them by contractors who have these cost-plus-commission contracts. The manufacturers are honestly trying to do the best they can for the Government in this crisis, but their men are being bought away from them by these contractors who are offering them all kinds of wages for temporary jobs, and the men who thus leave seldom come back. It is not fair, Mr. Chairman, to the manufacturers of this country who are trying to give the Government supplies at a fair price to have this system go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. I ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. What specific information has the gentleman from Massachusetts that these contractors are paying such wages as he indicated in his remarks here?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, as I stated, the two instances I gave at the commencement of my remarks are based on hearsay. But I understand from my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], who represents the Lowell district, that the manufacturers in Lowell who are furnishing supplies for the Army have been seriously handicapped by having their men bought away from them by some of the contractors there who have been working under these cost-plus-commission contracts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the munitions matter, which is much more important for the reason that the manufacture of munitions will continue during the entire duration of the war. It is not my purpose to criticize Gen. Crozier, for whom I have the very highest regard, or the War Department, in regard to the contract for rifles to which reference has been made. It may be that it was necessary at that time to make that kind of a contract in order to get those rifles quickly. It does seem to me, however, that something ought to be done by the Committee on Appropriations in regard to future contracts, to limit, and, if possible, prohibit wherever possible, the system of awarding contracts without competition on the cost-plus-commission basis.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] attempted to defend this particular kind of contract, but to my surprise other members of the committee proceeded to criticize him. When he spoke about the 6 per cent allowance for interest as being no part of profits there was a loud dissent. I think they criticized him justly, and if they criticized then they ought to do something to remedy the situation. It is true that the old classical school of economists in defining profits divided them into three parts—first, interest or reward for abstinence, as they called it; second, insurance or remuneration for risk; and third, wages of superintendence, which would include the possession of the personnel and organization sufficient to carry on any particular kind of business. In the case of the kind of contract criticized by the gentleman from Mississippi, a Democratic member of the committee, however, there is no reason why any allowance should be made for interest in addition to a 10 per cent profit. These men own their own plants; the Government furnishes the machinery, tools, and implements, and pays them every month one-tenth of the contract price, so that they do not have to borrow any money. As it stands, these men will reap a profit if they turn over their output only twice a year—and I believe they will turn it over oftener than that—of 26 per cent without any risk whatever. As the gentleman from Mississippi well says, whatever may have been the necessity of making the first contract, in future contracts the smaller manufacturing concerns of this country who are capable of making a large amount of rifles ought to be given a chance to compete.

The only excuse for making a contract of this kind, giving a monopoly without competition to a few big concerns, is that they alone are able to carry out the contract. It would seem that if the Government is going to continue to make monthly and even fortnightly cash advances to the contractor then the smaller concerns without a large amount of capital can successfully undertake some of the work and by competition greatly reduce the price paid by the Government for all its future work.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman two questions. One is if it is his understanding that the contracts for building the cantonments are paid on a basis of cost plus 10 per cent?

Mr. DALLINGER. That is what I understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then the gentleman ought to read the contract, because he will find that that is not the fact. Ten per cent is paid only on a certain sum, and when the amount runs higher it scales down to 6 per cent and below.

Mr. DALLINGER. Is it not a fact that at the beginning when the first contracts were let there was not such a provision in the contract?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; at the beginning these men took the work without any contract at all but with the understanding that they were willing to trust the Government to make a fair contract, and 10 per cent plus was talked of as a basis for the contract. When the contracts came to be formally entered into they were entered into on a sliding scale which, as the volume of work increased, the amount of compensation plus the cost diminated, and finally there is a provision that when it reaches a certain sum then the compensation should be, I think, limited to $250,000 as a maximum.

I want to suggest to the gentleman one other thing, if he will permit me, and that is he is quite in error in the assumption that there are many small concerns in this country that can make rifles. I wish it was true, but it is not true. It is not true that you can get the machinery quickly. It would take a great deal of time to get the tools, the jigs, dies, and so forth, to equip the manufacturer even if he is familiar in a general way with the work of making rifles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask a question about the cantonments?

Mr. DALLINGER. The gentleman can do that in his own time. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I know perfectly well, without having the figures before me, that there are more than three concerns in this country able to manufacture rifles, particularly when the Government furnishes the machinery and tools. If the Government, after the completion of the present contract, wants to get the rifles quickly and get them out at a fairly reasonable price, there is no reason whatever why they can not give that work to more than three concerns.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman tell me where the tools are which we can procure to make the rifles?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will refer the gentleman to the testimony before the committee, that they bought the tools and implements necessary to manufacture these rifles from the British Government for nine and a half million dollars.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then it is the gentleman's theory that you could have dismantled these plants and scattered these tools around over the country and yet successfully have made rifles?

Mr. DALLINGER. I certainly believe that a sufficient number of the tools and machines could be removed to enable some of the smaller concerns to carry on the manufacture if the large concerns are not willing to treat the Government fairly. However, I understand that the testimony is that there were $2,000,000 worth of these tools that had not been used at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. The British Government did not sell us those $2,000,000 worth, but the gentleman's idea is that we could take them by force of arms?

Mr. DALLINGER. The Government could easily obtain the $2,000,000 worth as they obtained the rest. Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of criticism about the exorbitant profits of munition manufacturers and a great deal of feeling about it among the people at large. When other manufacturers doing business for the Government are making their products at a reasonable profit, and when all our people are preparing to make every sacrifice to win this war, I believe that the munition manufacturers should be content with a reasonable profit. If they are not willing voluntarily to do their share in this great struggle, they should be compelled to do so by legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the most difficult criticism to meet is that of the anonymous liar. When John Jones states that Richard Doe was informed by John Smith that Peter Brown was receiving $60 a week on a Government contract and had nothing to do but to keep out of sight the statement on its face is such that it should not receive credit or attention.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Appropriations investigated every report, every rumor, every criticism that came to its attention. A number of statements were called to my attention of instances in which it was stated improper prices were being paid or improper compensation paid to labor. A number of those matters were referred directly to the War Department and investigated under direct supervision of the Secretary of War, and I do not know of any instance in which it has been possible to justify any of the criticisms made.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not believe that the system of letting contracts on cost plus a commission offers every inducement to the contractor to pay more for his labor and materials than he otherwise would pay, and whether he believes it is an economical way of letting contracts for the Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If every contractor who is to do work for the Government were an unmitigated scoundrel, I have no doubt it would be very difficult to prevent excessive costs, but I assume that the building contractors are just as honest as the average business man. The mere fact that a manufacturer happens to be manufacturing clothing does not put him on a moral plane so superior to the man who is building cantonments that there is any difference either in their desires or their methods.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I wish to make this statement first. Mr. Chairman, it is easy to criticize costs plus contracts when not possessed of information or when no consideration is given to the situation. The important thing at this time was to have the cantonments built in time to house the army that was being conscripted. It was necessary to have cantonments that would house approximately 750,000 men built within an average of approximately 90 days. Many of those cantonments were located in sections of the country where there was not only no surplus labor, but where there was no adequate supply of the particular character of labor required. To obtain the labor necessary the contractors had to take from their customary and fixed occupations the labor required. As the task was to be a temporary one, to induce men to give up permanent employment in order to take this temporary employment it was necessary to make concessions in the way of compensation in excess of what would be the normal market rate. In many instances, because of the emergency character of the work, because of the inadequate supply of labor, because in some instances of the almost impossibility of obtaining the required supply of labor, prices have been paid for labor that ordinarily could not be justified and would not be tolerated. This was a factor that neither the contractor nor the Government itself could control, because the Government was not in position to conscript men to labor at a price to be fixed by it.

So far as the materials were concerned, however, a different situation existed. Schedules of the materials required for the cantonments were prepared by experts called in to assist those charged with the doing of the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Arrangements were made in many instances whereby the materials would be furnished at less than the then market rate. The contractor was informed that he could obtain the schedule of lumber or other materials required at certain places at certain prices. He could purchase his lumber or materials where he pleased, but he was not permitted to charge the Government in excess of the price at which the Government had indicated he could obtain the material.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if it is not a fact in regard to clothing and shoes and things of that kind that contracts were let to the lowest bidders? There were bids.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall come to that in a moment. So that as far as the cantonments were concerned the one thing that had to be done was to provide the accommodations for the Army that was being called together in the quickest possible time, and necessarily the work was more expensive than it would have been under normal conditions, if long periods of time could have been taken. I shall insert in the Record at this place article 3 of the cantonment contracts:

ARTICLE III.

Determination of fee: As full compensation for the services of the contractor, including profit and all general overhead expense, except as herein specifically provided, the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor in the manner hereinafter prescribed a fee to be determined at the time of completion of the work from the following schedule, except as hereinafter otherwise provided:

If the cost of the work is under $100,000, a fee of 10 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $100,000 and under $125,000, a fee of $10,000.

If the cost of the work is over $125,000 and under $250,000, a fee of 8 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $250,000 and under $266,666.67, a fee of $20,000.

If the cost of the work is over $266,666.67 and under $500,000, a fee of 7½ per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $500,000 and under $535,714.29, a fee of $37,500.

If the cost of the work is over $535,714.29 and under $3,000,000, a fee of 7 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $3,000,000 and under $3,500,000, a fee of $210,000.

If the cost of the work is over $3,500,000, a fee of 6 per cent of such cost.

Provided, however, That the fee upon such part of the cost of the work as is represented by payments to subcontractors, under subdivision (b) above, shall in each of the above contingencies be 5 per cent and no more of the amount of such part of the cost.

The cost of materials purchased or furnished by the contracting officer for said work, exclusive of all freight charges thereon, shall be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of reckoning such fee to the contractor, but for no other purpose.

The fee for reconstructing and replacing any of the work destroyed or damaged shall be such percentage of the cost thereof, not exceeding 7 per cent, as the contracting officer may determine.

The total fee to the contractor hereunder shall in no event exceed the sum of $250,000, anything in this agreement to the contrary notwithstanding.

It provides that if the cost of the work is under $100,000 a fee of 10 per cent is paid, and then as the cost increases the allowance decreases, until if the cost of the work is over $3,500,000 a fee of 6 per cent of such cost; but in no instance is a fee in excess of $250,000 to be paid for the work. The gentleman spoke about the rifle contracts. There is no plant in the United States to-day outside of the two Government arsenals and the three concerns which have the contracts for the manufacture of the Enfield rifle modified to use the American ammunition which can make a modern service Army rifle of the three kinds that are in contemplation. It is not possible to convert any other plant in the United States so that it can turn out rifles of the character required inside of a period of from one year to 18 months. The only plants that could furnish the rifles needed, and essential for the army that was being raised, are the three plants with which the Government has made the contracts. The gentleman is in error in assuming that either the United States or any other government or any private concern has stored away in a warehouse or a safety deposit vault the jigs and dies and machinery to the extent of two or three million dollars that could be utilized in any plant. Long ago the British Government made contracts with those three plants to turn out a million and a quarter rifles. They encountered difficulties that were not anticipated, because the turning out of those rifles required skilled work of the highest order. The British Government was compelled to put $18,000,000 into those concerns in order to have the contracts filled, and it took over in return the title of the machinery in the three plants. There is about $2,000,000 worth of machinery which has never been unpacked, and it is in those plants now; but in the contract that was made the British Government reserved that machinery out of the contract, so that it was not available to the United States. In connection with contracts for clothing a somewhat different situation arose. It must be considered from two standpoints; one is the purchase or acquisition of the raw materials out of which the clothing is made and the other is the manufacture of the garments themselves. When the United States entered this war the khaki cloth out of which the Army uniform is made was not a commercial article in the United States. There was none in the market. The only cloth of the character manufactured was manufactured for the Government of the United States, except insignificant quantities that were manufactured in the garments that can be found in sporting-goods houses in the various large cities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more because, perhaps, I can complete at this time the statement about contracts and not be compelled to do it again.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So that the situation that confronted the Government was, not to go into the open market and obtain the khaki cloth necessary for those garments, but to go into the market and induce mills to make khaki cloth of the character that they had never made previously. The Government made the contract for the cloth itself and certain other materials, and concerns that manufacture the cloth into garments submitted bids and the Government distributed the work throughout the country in accordance with the bids. It is not true that we are obtaining shoes at $2.95 a pair. We did buy shoes about two years ago for less than $3 a pair. We are now paying over $5 a pair. Any shoe manufacturer in the United States who desired to manufacture a portion of the shoes required for the Army was given a contract for them to the extent for which he had capacity to manufacture. Some of the difficulties in supplying the Army may be appreciated when it is stated that it is necessary to carry 90 different sizes of shoes to outfit the Army, and to obtain shoes for an army of a million men does not mean to obtain a million pair of shoes, but, based upon calculation resulting from years of experience, the Quartermaster Department is able to compute the allowance in excess of the number of men it must have of shoes. Over 30 sizes of coats are necessary, and corresponding numbers of garments of various kinds must be carried. For instance, Mr. Chairman, for tenting purpose alone, in connection with the National Guard camps, it was estimated that 19,000,000 yards of canvas ducking would be required. The output of the mills of the United States was only 16,000,000 yards a year, and in addition to the canvas ducking required for the tents the Navy Department and other departments of the Government made demands for very considerable quantities. It was necessary to induce carpet mills to abandon the weaving of carpets and take up the weaving of canvas ducking. In many other and in innumerable ways it was required to adapt the facilities of the United States to furnishing the materials required for the conduct of the war.

The cost plus 10 per cent contracts have been criticized. One of the difficulties that confronted the Government at the time was that no reputable contractor, no contractor who understood his business and who was not attempting to get a contract merely to finance it and to turn it over at a profit, in view of the conditions of the labor market and the material market, was willing to enter a contract on a very large scale which did not make provision for a constantly increasing cost, both of materials and labor. No one can predict from day to day what labor will bring, and unless the Government had taken the measures it did take to control and obtain the materials to be utilized, in many of those enterprises it would have been impossible to determine what the cost of material would be. The Government was not in the position of a private citizen to go into the market where there was an ample supply and ample competition, but the Government was in the position of having requirements that far exceeded not only the visible supply but were far in excess of existing facilities to furnish materials. Under such circumstances the contracts had to be made and business had to be done, and the Government work had to be carried on under conditions and in ways that in normal and ordinary times would not have been attempted. I just suggest to the gentlemen that if they will take the public hearings of the Committee on Appropriations and read them carefully they will find that many of these criticisms are without foundation and should not be used here as the basis of criticism for which there is no justification.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from New York may be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, did the testimony taken before the committee to which the gentleman from New York has just referred change his mind absolutely as to the propriety of letting the contract for cots about which he complained here some weeks ago?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it did not, and I shall state now to the gentleman from Wisconsin and to the committee what I have stated before. We are proposing to expend $11,000,000,000 in the course of a year, excluding the $7,000,000,000 that we are to loan to the allies. No man nor any set of men who have lived since the beginning of the world could spend that money without making mistakes, without doing unwise things, without doing things that are subject to criticism, and without having some of the money frittered away in a manner that it should not be.

But we must not seek out as a criterion of how the work is being done the occasional mistake or the accidental fault. We must judge of the work from a broad standpoint, and we must determine whether upon the whole the conduct of the Government's business has been marked by capacity, competency, and integrity upon the part of those charged with the doing of it. [Applause.] If that be done, it does not lie with us to condemn the entire administration of affairs, because there will crop out from time to time mistakes and errors. The remedy is, when an error has been made, to accurately ascertain the facts and then criticize the action. I criticized the cot contract, but not publicly until I had obtained from those who had charge of the awarding of the contract complete information that justified the criticism. I did not indulge in criticism here based upon rumors, vague whisperings, and repeated conversations running through numerous people, so that the originator could not be located. I based my criticisms upon ascertained facts. If other Members of the House, when rumors reach them or when alleged information reaches them, will take the time to ascertain the truth of the matter before indulging in criticism, they will be performing their duty in the most effective and most patriotic manner. But to give circulation to every idle rumor, to every anonymous lie, that has circulated either by unpatriotic men or by those who wish to embarrass the Government at this time, is not to do our duty in the manner the country expects or the situation demands. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the statement I made on yesterday in reference to the rifle contract is borne out by the record. Every statement that I made is borne out by the hearings. In the examination of the two principal witnesses, Gen. Crozier and Mr. Scott, you will find that every statement made is borne out by the hearings that lasted over several days. I do not believe that you will find a member of the Committee on Appropriations—if so, he certainly is in a great minority—who justifies, on the whole, the rifle contract which the Government entered into. I doubt whether if a member of the committee had been placed in a position where he would have been called upon to sign the contract he would say now that he would do so; because, instead of that contract being one where 26 per cent may be made, it is a contract where perhaps at least 46 per cent will be made.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations well states, as I stated in my original remarks, that it was one contract entered into where the contractor had no chance to lose. Nor did I believe, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that always in entering into contracts you can determine whether men have done the best they could until you know the mental attitude with which the men representing the Government approach the contractor. The mental attitude has a great deal to do with it. And the criticism I made of the contract was not criticism of a single officer in the Government. I do not question their motive or their sincerity. But I do not yield to them all the business wisdom in making contracts. But I felt it my duty to the House to call to the attention of the House and to the country the character of the contract, with this 6 per cent first upon an unascertained amount of plant involved in making rifles, with a 10 per cent on the cost of the contract, an allowance for plant depreciation, without knowing the amount of capital that would actually be used in manufacturing the rifles. In addition to that the machinery especially fitted for manufacturing rifles is owned by the Federal Government. Perhaps the only thing, practically, that the contractor will furnish will be the building in which the rifles are made and the power. The balance of the machinery is furnished by the Government. And I felt and I feel now that under that contract, according to the testimony in this record, these contractors must make something like 46 per cent on their investment. Because if the contractors have $10,000,000 of their own property, to be ascertained and the value fixed in the future, that was the highest amount, and a higher amount than was fixed by Gen. Crozier, because he put it at $8,000,000.

In the examination Mr. Scott himself said that he had made no investigation of the amount, but that it was simply his knowledge of the amount of machinery necessary to carry out the contract. Mr. Scott was the gentleman, Gen. Crozier stated, who had given his advice to his committee that warranted him in entering on the contract. I think it is fair to Gen. Crozier to say—while it did not go into the record, and I did not intend to say it—that he said to me that there are many features of the contract that he himself did not indorse, but he was simply one member of the board that passed upon it. I say that in fairness to him, because it was his testimony, and he was endeavoring to defend his committee, and the contract was one that could not, in my judgment, be defended. We expect to ask men in every department of life to do a patriotic service to the country and to render service at the lowest possible profit consistent with good business judgment. Why do we not demand the same sacrifice of the munitions makers? And I am responsible, and wholly responsible, for bringing this matter to the attention of the committee. I did it because I thought it was my duty to do it and your right to know. And in the future, if there is any wisdom in what I have said, or if the House in the future should want the control of the contracts or even in this bill, or suggest any amendment that might cure the defects which they might find in this contract, then they may do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Do I understand his statement to be this: That Gen. Crozier entered into a contract for the manufacture of arms for the Government and that he was advised to enter into that contract by Mr. Scott, the chairman of the committee authorized?

Mr. SISSON. That is the testimony.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, does the gentleman mean to say that when Mr. Scott was brought before the chairman of the committee to give advice he was asked upon what he had based that advice, and he admitted that he had never seen the plant?

Mr. SISSON. I will not say that he went that far, but he said he had never investigated absolutely the value of all of the plant. His testimony was that, from his knowledge of manufacturing, the power and the buildings and the equipment to turn out these rifles would require an investment of something like $18,000,000. That was a mere estimate; but you will find, if you will look at the hearings, that Gen. Crozier, when I endeavored to ascertain the value of the plant from him used in the manufacture of the rifles, admitted candidly that he did not know, and then I asked him, with a view to asking him more questions, whether it would be a million dollars, and Gen. Crozier answered, "Yes; it would be very much more than a million dollars." I am not quoting his language exactly; but I then asked him if it would be $10,000,000, and he said he did not think it was quite that much.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. Mr. GILLET inquired—

Have you any idea whether the investment of these people on which they are going to get, we will suppose, $4,000,000—whether it is $1,000,000 or $20,000,000?

Gen. CROZIER. I am inclined to think it will be somewhere between $10,000,000 and $20,000,000.

Mr. SISSON. But you will find elsewhere in the hearings that I examined him at length on the $10,000,000 proposition, when Gen. Crozier had stated that he thought it would be about $8,000,000, and I then took $10,000,000 as the amount for the basis for my examination, and if you will look through the testimony carefully you will find on that basis of 10 per cent on a million rifles it would amount to $4,000,000, and adding 6 per cent it amounts to 46 per cent. I do not say that independently Gen. Crozier made that exact statement, but I do know that was his answer to the question I asked him, and I took what would be a maximum amount, and he said he himself did not know. Then in order that the matter might be fairly placed before the House, Gen. Crozier suggested that if we got Mr. Scott before the committee he could tell us, because he was the man who advised the contract, and from him we would get all the information as to the value of the plant. Mr. Scott was sent for; he did not know. The chairman himself manifested some surprise, because he said, "Mr. Scott, we were told that you could give us the information." But Mr. Scott did not know. So that there is not in that record anywhere any positive statement about the value of the plant being used.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was the company to be allowed? What was the percentage on the cost on the actual amount invested in the business?

Mr. SISSON. Six per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And nobody who testified before your committee, who advised the making of that contract, or who signed that contract, knew what that amount was?

Mr. SISSON. They did not. They said they were going to have it investigated in the future by experts; so much so, that if you will look at the hearings—unless they have stricken it out, because my recollection is perfectly accurate in this statement—I asked the witness then, "Has the Government bought a pig in a sack?"

Now, I have no criticism to make of the cantonment contracts, although I believe the principle at the bottom of it is wrong. I believe there is no business in it. But if it is the best the Government could do, I am not criticizing it, because they did have a sliding scale in the cantonment contract. The only criticism I had made was not so much at the time in the nature of a criticism as calling to the attention of the Members of this House the information which I, as a servant of the House on the committee, thought you were entitled to know.

Now, just one moment and I am through. That 6 per cent is certainly 6 per cent on the amount to be agreed upon in the future. The 10 per cent is not calculated, mark you, on the amount of capital invested. The 10 per cent is calculated on the gross cost of these rifles to the manufacturer. In other words, if a rifle costs $40, they get $4 profit on a rifle; if it is $30, they get $3. If they have $18,000,000 invested, and the rifles shall cost $36,000,000 as the gross cost, then they have turned that capital over twice. Then their profit would be 26 per cent on the 1,000,000 rifles. Then $18,000,000 is the wildest sort of a high estimate on plant investment. At any rate, no one connected with the Government knew the value.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not at this time want to offer any criticism of the contract that has been made, but I simply want to rise at this time and in a very friendly way call the attention of the House briefly to this one thing, so that in future it will not happen again.

Time and again during the last two years we have called the attention of the other side to the fact that this country was unprepared in munitions of war; that you had arsenals that were standing idle and that you ought to put into your appropriation bills money enough to start them up; and we were always met with this proposition—that we could depend upon the private manufacturer at any time to produce the goods at a reasonable profit.

Gentlemen, I want to call your attention to this fact, that you are now paying from three to five times the price for a rifle that it could have been manufactured for in our own arsenals if you had only listened at the time your attention was called to it. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman, if I am not mistaken, represents a district adjoining the Rock Island Arsenal.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. SABATH. And you have made the statement that the plants were idle?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that in the last two years the Rock Island Arsenal has been in full blast and working with all the force they could secure?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Absolutely not. You are mistaken.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman knows I am in thorough sympathy with him in the plan of having as much Government work done as possible at the arsenals?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You are in sympathy now, but it is too late. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Now, let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact: Does he mean to say that the Government would have exercised wisdom when it had an Army of less than 100,000 men if it had invested enough money in arsenals to produce the supplies and equipments for an Army of 2,000,000 men?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am not arguing that. I am arguing that you did not have to invest it; you had it standing idle and did not put the money in the bills when we asked you to.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am not mistaken.

Mr. BORLAND. The Rock Island Arsenal has been running at its full capacity and producing more equipment than we had use for with the Army we had.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The Rock Island Arsenal is not running to its full capacity now.

Mr. GILLETTE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETTE. Was not the Rock Island Arsenal absolutely closed as to the making of small arms for several years?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Absolutely closed, and we were pleading and trying to get enough money out of your committee to manufacture these arms. After the Villa raid on Columbus we did get $5,000,000 for the manufacture of the rifles, but the Senate committee and the Senate itself struck it out. Why was that done? Senator CUMMINS, of my State, made an able plea for the retention of this item in the bill, and it was afterwards restored. As late as February 21 of this year you refused to adopt an amendment offered by myself to give the Ordnance Department the amount of money that they asked for to be used for manufacture of rifles; now you must pay $50 for what would have cost you $15 if you had started up your arsenals instead of depending on private manufacture.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very different condition from that which existed five years ago or six years ago or eight years ago. It would be impossible now for substantially any of the supplies for 1,000,000 men or 2,000,000 men or more to be had as the statute provides in a time of peace, namely, by advertising for bids with specifications, getting the bids after advertising, having them tabulated at great delay as to time, and then letting the contracts to the lowest and best bidder.

Now, I am not going to enter at this time a criticism of the Congress on the one hand or the administration upon the other hand in the past. I have got my views about it. What is the use of criticizing in the present condition or as the condition has been since the declaration of war, the making of war in fact, by the Executive and the formal declaration by the Congress?

We were totally and substantially unprepared on land and on sea when we entered this contest, and we had to do it quickly. We passed a draft law. Men were drafted and they had to be trained. We had to have the tents and the cantonments and clothing, and we had to have light artillery and heavy artillery; we had to have the rifles; and we had to have everything that was necessary to enable us to do our part in assisting our allies.

In my judgment the hasty preparation of the war for the last few months and for the coming 12 months, if this war does not close, will cost Uncle Sam at least one-third, if not double, the amount it would have cost him if we had been prepared fairly well at the entrance of the United States into the contest. Who is to blame?

Each man may have his own idea and the country may have its ideas. It does not make any difference who is to blame so far as the present emergency is concerned. We have to have our cantonments; we have to have our rifles; we have to have explosives; we have to have heavy and light artillery. The war having progressed on the other side by the time we entered it, the wages of this class of labor had very greatly increased, and in fact the wages of all classes of labor had increased. The price of gold had lessened compared with what we had to buy. A man that had a million dollars of gold two years ago, if he kept it for its buying capacity, is not worth to exceed $600,000 to-day.

Now, touching the specific matter we have been talking about. I listened to the evidence. I am not a manufacturer; I do not hold a brief for the defense of any man connected with the Government, for the defense of any man that makes one of these contracts or for any commission. I know very few of them. I think I need not assure the House when I make that statement that I do not know or even recall the names of the three concerns that got these contracts for the manufacture of rifles. I do know from the evidence that the Government owns the factories for the production of rifles, for the production of light and heavy artillery, to make any considerable contribution to the supply we must have. Munitions of all kinds and explosives were comparatively nil, and if we got ready for the contest, we had to get ready as we have been getting ready.

Now, you speak of these parties that have the contracts for the rifles. They might have been commandeered; the Government might have taken possession, making compensation, if you please, for the plants, sending the owners thereof to the courts. If we had followed that policy, you could see at once that the Government, now having its hands full, would have been swamped, because to undertake to make explosives, to construct such heavy and light artillery, to manufacture clothing, if it was all thrown on the Government, if you had commandeered the whole thing, you would have absolutely swamped it. So we had to do the practical thing.

I never was inside of a factory that made rifles, and I suppose I never will be. I am a tenderfoot, but I do know as an individual that when you take the whole of a plant, when it loses its ordinary business and you set it at work for 6 or 12 months upon something else, it throws it out of joint. I know that the investment in the plant depreciates. It is said that it depreciates 6 per cent. But after all, when the contract is completed, I undertake to say that while there is some guess as to this or that or the other, with these great concerns on their hands with all that means, under all the circumstances I would not give one-half of the investment for it.

I do not believe there is a Member of Congress, including the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson], who would give one-half or one-third of the worth of the manufactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think that we are fortunate under all of the conditions in having great establishments to make explosives, creating a city here and a city there, and making explosives and selling them to the Government at from 3 to 4 cents a pound, if I recollect right, less than the Government can produce them for in its own factories.

I said yesterday and I repeat, according to my best judgment, whatever anybody else may say—and I am only responsible for my own judgment—this contract is a reasonable contract under all the conditions. Gentlemen may disagree. They do not have to agree with me. I am giving you only my own judgment in the premises, and I hold no brief for the defense of the administration. I am one Member of Congress responsible to my constituency, and we here represent all of the constituencies. We have to act according to our best judgment in the performance of the duty under the Constitution. We are the legislative body. The executive body is at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Without hunting for criticisms at this time—and I have no desire to ever hunt for criticisms in this condition that we are in—without hunting for criticisms, I think that we would better make these appropriations, and if we find that it is necessary to limit the cost of what we buy, as we have done heretofore in time of peace occasionally, why, let us do it. But I am not ready to limit the cost by legislation of anything that we do buy at this time, because who knows what the cost is going to be, with the I. W. W., with strikes that exist in so many States. It is perhaps natural, as civilization rests upon the self-interest of the unit and governments rest upon a combination or a cooperation of individuals, to look out for our own interests, so that I am not making an attack on labor or on capital. I am not making an attack upon anyone. I will say, however, as to capital and labor, that in peace and in war one man's liberty ceases where another man's liberty begins, and I do say that, so far as I am concerned, I am inclined to think under all of the conditions, as to cantonnements, as to clothing, as to boots and shoes, as to explosives, as to heavy and light artillery, including rifles, that we have done fairly well. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read. This rifle provision comes later on in the bill. We have been an hour and 10 minutes here to-day and have not yet read any of the bill.

Mr. LONDON. I shall take only five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I shall withhold my objection for five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, these idle rumors of which the distinguished chairman of the Committee of Appropriations has complained will come back again and again to annoy and pester the administration. The difficulty with the situation seems to be that the business world has interpreted in its own way the slogan of the President that profits and patriotism should not be mentioned together. The business world says that wherever profits and patriotism come in conflict, patriotism must give way. Commercialism is always the same. It never changes. It is sordid, whether in time of peace or in time of national stress, in time of international calamity, in time of the worst form of misfortune that can befall the Nation, in time of war—business exists for profits, and the business man in most cases will be selfish.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. We have many people in the country scattered all over who are engaged in striking for better wages, many of them engaged in striking for recognition of the union, and many of them with increasing wages. Does the gentleman call those people business men or patriotic men?

Mr. LONDON. The only difference between the selfishness of the two is this: That while the worker strikes for higher wage in order to meet the higher cost of living, he strikes for a necessity, he strikes for bare existence; the business man who makes a million dollars profit, who strikes against the Government for two millions, is a traitor to the Government and a traitor to the people, and the two things can not be compared at all. One strikes to continue his existence, which is the law of nature, and the other strikes the Government by trying to exact inordinate profits. However, if the President's proclamation that patriotism and profit ought never to be mentioned together is to hold good, there is only one remedy, and I am compelled to suggest that one remedy. If there are but three factories in the entire country that can manufacture rifles, the only solution is to seize those three factories and to put their superintendents and every member of their board of directors and their foremen and every worker upon the same basis on which you put your Army in the field. Seize those factories, take possession of them, squeeze out the element of profit. But this is a solution that the business men, chairmen of the advisory committees, will never suggest, you may rest assured.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do I understand the gentleman to favor the Government commandeering all labor?

Mr. LONDON. I favor the Government commandeering these three plants where these plants are the only ones in the country that can manufacture the rifles, instead of our permitting those three plants to hold up the Government. I would use the power of the Government to take possession of those three plants?

Mr. SHERLEY. And to compel the laborer to work there? Would the gentleman do the same as to all other industrial plants where he does not like the terms of contract?

Mr. LONDON. I would do that exactly with every industrial plant.

Mr. SHERLEY. Including labor?

Mr. LONDON. When you come to the individual, when you come to personal service—

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. LONDON. One moment, I can take care of myself.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure of it.

Mr. LONDON. When it comes to using the individual, it is good sense to permit the largest possible latitude for full play of individual action, and you can not use a million human beings and turn them into a machine, but if you are intelligent, if you are true leaders, you will inspire those million men with the desire to do the very best.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. LONDON. One moment—

Mr. SHERLEY. But will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman in favor of commandeering labor?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for another five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not object now, but at the end of the five minutes I will insist upon the reading of this bill.

Mr. LONDON. I will not use all of the five minutes. Now, there must be a distinction drawn between the commandeering of men and property. Let us not run away from it—

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not going to run away from it. Men are instrumentalities through which property is used, and I want to know whether the gentleman is in favor of going to the logic of his position and commandeering not only plants but all forms of labor?

Mr. LONDON. I should certainly say that men who have voted for conscription are in that position.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not saying whether they should be or not. I am trying to find out the position of the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. My position is this: When you deal with the individual, you must inspire him to act along the line on which you want him to act—

Mr. SHERLEY. Why should you inspire one individual and not another?

Mr. LONDON. You can inspire the great masses if you convince them you are right, and if you can not convince them that you are right you have no right to commandeer their activities.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let us see. Where would the gentleman start to commandeer the activities of individuals?

Mr. LONDON. Let us first take up the commandeering of property; that is the easier proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am going to the proposition exactly. Here are three plants. They have as a part of their human factors the managers, the clerks, the superintendents, the wage earners, the daily laborers, and so forth, skilled and unskilled. Where would the gentleman begin to commandeer the human element of those plants and where would he stop?

Mr. LONDON. Let us see. Here are three plants. I would declare that property the property of the people and take over the plants. I would tackle the easier proposition first—the property part. Then you come to the men. I would say, "We want your help; we want to be fair; we want to establish a committee on industrial adjustments through the war. If you have any complaints, we will hear your complaints and your grievances; we will establish a court of grievances in the industry, so that you may bring in any complaint and not be punished for presenting a complaint." That is what I would want to say and do. In other words, I believe you should treat them as human beings and not reduce the individuality of each of them to nothing. I would give full play to their individuality, so that it would be an inspiration to them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Suppose some of the men are not like the balance and say that they do not want to work, what would you do then?

Mr. LONDON. Those men have the right not to work.

Mr. SHERLEY. So the gentleman answers finally my question by saying he is not in favor of commandeering men?

Mr. LONDON. I say the commandeering of men must be applied in a different way to the commandeering of property. If the gentleman does not understand the difference between property and a living human being I am helpless.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman may be helpless for other causes than my ignorance upon that particular matter.

Mr. LONDON. I do not know; the gentleman is not ignorant, but he will not admit the difference—

Mr. SHERLEY. I not only admit it but freely state it, and what I am trying to find out is where the gentleman would stop. Now here are three plants which are necessary to be operated. Would he go ahead and say to the organization "You can work or not"?

Mr. LONDON. Let us reason it out. You are certainly not at a disadvantage by making the plants public property.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is a matter that may or may not be so.

Mr. LONDON. Exactly; you have gained this much, you have made the plants public property, you have commandeered them, you have taken the plant. Now you tackle the human problem, and I say the most sensible way to tackle the human problem is to treat it as a human problem in a way that will give full play to the individual, which will appeal to the individuality of the man. That is my way of dealing with human beings.

Mr. SHERLEY. Suppose some people might think that by the same sort of appeal you could keep these organizations engaged on this work for the Government and get the result as economically and as cheaply or cheaper?

Mr. LONDON. The people and we who represent them here will be confronted at the end of the war, justly or unjustly, with the greatest scandal in the history of this Republic.

The Clerk read as follows:

For an addition to the fuse-shop building, $30,000; in all, $1,145,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that if he is not going to discuss this provision at this time I will make a point of order.

Mr. DALLINGER. I am going to discuss this provision. This is an appropriation for Government arsenals. I believe that the Government ought, if it can not get the munition manufacturers to make rifles at somewhere near a reasonable price, to take that machinery which it purchased from the British Government, make additions to the Government plants, and manufacture all the rifles in Government arsenals. Some time ago the Bethlehem Steel Co. was holding up the United States Government in regard to armor plate, and this Congress, although I do not suppose a majority of the Members believe in Government ownership on general principles, passed a bill for the construction of a Government plant for the manufacture of armor plate, and since that time the Bethlehem Steel Co. has assumed a very different attitude toward the Government of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to have the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or any other Member of this House misconstrue what I say. I expressly stated in my opening remarks this morning that the instances which I cited were based on hearsay evidence, and that I only mentioned them as examples of the sort of abuse which, in spite of every precaution, is inevitable to a greater or less extent in a cost-plus-commission contract. I was not criticizing the good faith or the honesty of any Government official. I was simply criticizing a kind of contract which, however necessary it may have been in the past, is unbusinesslike and wasteful and which, if possible, ought to be avoided in the future.

Mr. Chairman, if there is a Member of this House that has stood by this administration in this war through thick and thin, in season and out, it is myself. Now, the President of the United States wants the Members of this House, and rightly so, to go back to their districts in a week or two and explain to their constituents the situation in which this country finds itself and to urge all of our citizens to do everything in their power to support the Government at Washington and to make every sacrifice in this great war to make the world safe for democracy. Now, one of the things that we will be confronted with is the tremendous profits which a few people are making out of the war. Although I believe with the members of the Appropriations Committee that the War Department on the contracts already made for cantonments and for rifles has done the best that it could under all the circumstances, because the officials having the matter in charge were confronted with a condition and not a theory; nevertheless I believe that it is the duty of this Committee on Appropriations and of this House when it is passing a bill appropriating almost $5,000,000,000 to carry on this war, to make some provision in it to protect the administrative part of this Government against being held up by men who want to make extortionate profits out of the crisis in which their country finds itself.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am making no criticism of what the War Department has been compelled by the exigencies of the situation to submit to in the past. I am simply contending that now, when all these great manufacturing plants are equipped, when the material is forthcoming, when we are appropriating almost $5,000,000,000 more, something should be done so that the manufacturers who put profits above patriotism should be compelled to be satisfied with a reasonable return upon their investment.

On Saturday the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in reply to a question of mine, admitted that it was the province of this House and the duty of this House, to prescribe how contracts should be let. But there is nothing in this bill in any way limiting the rate of profit or even suggesting that the Government should commandeer plants and should manufacture in its own armories if these men are not willing to do it at a reasonable price.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows, of course, that that is already the law.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman is correct in saying that the law already authorizes the Government to manufacture in its own arsenals and to commandeer private plants, if in this bill we should make a lump-sum appropriation and make it immediately available for this express purpose, in case private concerns should be unwilling to make future contracts on reasonable terms, the result would be most salutary. Something should be done to protect the Government against extortion. Even cantonment contracts now provide for a sliding scale. Why should not at least some such provision apply to contracts for munitions?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Proving ground: For increasing facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, including necessary buildings, equipment, and land, $3,000,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the gentleman better make the point and we can get that behind us.

Mr. SISSON. I want to suggest an amendment, and I thought I would discuss the amendment while I was reserving the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the point of order lies the whole paragraph will go out.

Mr. SISSON. I think there will be no question about the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. Before the gentleman proceeds, if the item is subject to a point of order and it is to go out of the bill on the question of order, I do not propose that the committee shall take up any considerable time in the discussion of matter that will not be in the bill.

Mr. SISSON. If we can agree upon an amendment, I am willing to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I am not willing to agree to the amendment that I think he has in mind, namely, to exclude Kent Island from consideration as a proving ground. I therefore suggest that the gentleman make the point of order. And I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, because the item is not provided for by law. It contemplates the purchase of land, and the chairman of the committee himself, I do not think, will seriously contend that the point of order will not lie. This is certainly not authorized by law, and it has been universally held that on an appropriation bill, unless authorized by law, you have no right to acquire land. And that is contemplated in this item.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit, this item would under ordinary circumstances be carried in the fortification bill, and the fortification bill is a bill that has its right not dependent upon any act of Congress or any legislation undertaking to define the activities in connection with fortifications, but it rests upon the broad, basic power conferred by the Constitution to provide for the defense of the country, and has been so held in a number of cases.

Now, a proving ground is an absolute requisite for the conduct and the necessary work in connection with heavy ordnance or with light ordnance.

We have carried for years provisions in regard to proving grounds. We are carrying in this bill provisions for the enlargement of proving grounds. All of our arsenals have proving grounds. Some of them are very small. Some of them consist simply of buildings where, with a very short range, small arms are proved and tested. Some of them have larger proving grounds. We have also a proving ground now situated on Sandy Hook that was created in connection with the ordinary appropriations for the national defense.

It has never before to my knowledge been suggested that in connection with work of this character the proponent of a paragraph like this must put his finger upon a particular law specifying the right to provide for a proving ground. But it follows inevitably from the right to provide for the common defense. The gentleman would be just as well within the rules if he contended that we could not bring in on the fortifications bill or in this bill a provision for the fortification of one of our seaports because there was no basic law which declared that that particular seaport should be fortified.

I had no idea that the point would be made, or I would have been glad—

Mr. Sisson. The gentleman will remember that I reserved the right in the committee to make the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not recall that, but the gentleman is well within his rights to make what point of order he desires. But otherwise I would have been prepared to present to the Chair some direct rulings on the matter.

This proving ground is necessary in order to carry out work that is already undertaken by the Government in connection with both coast fortifications and heavy field ordnance, and I insist on the broad basic ground that I have laid down—of the obligation as well as the right of Congress to provide for the defense of the country—that it has the right to provide a proving ground in connection with the proving of seacoast and mobile artillery.

I do not want to delay the Chair, but I have sent the clerk for a reference. I have not been able to find it myself. I have no right to ask that the Chair delay the matter until it can be found, but I think there are a number of decisions that will bear out the basic statement I have made.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fitzgerald] wish to be heard on the point of order? If not, the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have no desire to take up the time of the Chair or the committee. I was just going to speak in support of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman is with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson], the Chair does not care to hear him.

As to the merits of this proposition the Chair has nothing to do. It is the duty of the Chair to execute the rules of the House as he understands them. Clause 2 of rule 21 provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The Chair, of course, understands the contention of the gentleman from Kentucky that this is in continuation of a project already authorized by law. The Chair desires to call attention to section 3736 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

No land shall be purchased on account of the United States, except under a law authorizing such purchase.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit, I do not recall a single instance in which there has been a basic law passed authorizing the Government to purchase land for coast defenses. Yet we have repeatedly purchased land as the result of provisions made on appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman from Kentucky will contend that repeals the statute read by the Chair.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Revised Statutes simply provide that money shall not be expended on the purchase of ground unless it is specifically authorized. This complies with a statute. What the Chair is considering is the point of order whether we have the right to make provision for the purchase of land.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair was proceeding to rule on. The Revised Statutes provide that no land shall be purchased on account of the United States except under a law authorizing such purchase. The purchase of land for a proving ground is not authorized by existing law, and it is clearly new legislation. The Chair happens to have at hand a decision which seems to be absolutely on all-fours with this case, which negatives, the Chair thinks, the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky that this item is in continuation of a project already authorized. The Chair refers to Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 3776, which reads as follows:

A proposition to purchase a separate and detached lot of land for an Army target range was held not to be in continuation of a public work. On June 11, 1906, the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when Mr. Francis W. Cushman, of Washington, proposed an amendment:

Land for target range: For the purchase of a tract of land, of 3,000 acres or less, at American Lake, near Tacoma, State of Washington, for a target range, $30,000.

Mr. Edgar D. Crumpacker, of Indiana, made the point of order that the amendment involved legislation.

After debate, the Chairman ruled:

"The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Crumpacker] has raised a point of order. The Chair thinks it is clearly obnoxious to the rule and subject to the point of order. The Chair thinks you might purchase land next to an Army post and that it would probably be a continuation of a public work, but it is evidently not in order to purchase a separate piece of land, as this amendment proposes. It is no more in order, in the opinion of the Chair, than it would be to provide on an appropriation bill for the erection of a hospital building or the construction of an Army post without a previous authorization of law therefor. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order."

The Chair thinks that is identical with the case at bar and the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For increasing railroad transportation facilities, $90,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am too old in the service of the House to quarrel over losing on a point of order, and particularly when the presiding officer of the House is as able a parliamentarian as the distinguished occupant of the chair. But I want to enter a protest so that it may be a part of the Record, against the broad ground of the decision of the Chair that in order to purchase land in connection with the defense of the country there must have been a previous authorization for the purchase of that land.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 14, after line 19, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For enlargement and repair of the filtration plant, $20,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 14, line 20, strike out the sum of "$1,420,200," and insert in lieu thereof the sum of "$1,440,200."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Watertown Arsenal, Mass.: For replacing roof and floors of machine shop, $160,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this appropriation carries all that is asked for by the War Department in connection with the Watertown Arsenal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it does not. We gave all that was asked by the Chief of Ordnance in the modified form in which it was submitted, except some additional money for the repair of roads and sidewalks, and some money for officers' quarters. As to the money required in the manufacturing facilities, the bill carries all that was recommended by the Chief of Ordnance.

Mr. DALLINGER. May I ask why the committee did not see fit to grant the appropriation for roads and sidewalks and officers' quarters?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The $40,000 requested for two sets of officers' quarters was to enable certain officers to live within the reservation rather than to live outside and have the quarters commuted. The committee did not believe that it was wise at this time to divert the energies of the Ordnance Department to building quarters when quarters could be obtained outside. The committee did not think that the money asked for roads and sidewalks was imperatively necessary.

Mr. DALLINGER. I want to state to the gentleman that that item has been asked for before.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; when once requested it never disappears, in the hope that Congress some time in a moment of absent-mindedness may grant the request. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALLINGER. The last time I was at Watertown it was perfectly evident that some repairs ought to be made to the roads and sidewalks. They have a good deal of teaming in and out of the Arsenal gates, and it seems to me that something ought to be done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee recommended an appropriation of $682,000. It did not think that the $46,000 ought to be provided. Upon that statement, it is apparent that the committee made recommendations that were ample to meet the request of the Chief of Ordnance. Moreover, ample funds will be provided for road repairs in all arsenals.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a railroad crane, $5,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 16, after line 17, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For rebuilding main roads inside the arsenal grounds, $15,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $789,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 16, in line 18, strike out the sum "$789,500" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$804,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York a question. I have tried to find in this bill some authorization of the use of money in preparing shelter for the men who are guarding bridges, now that winter is coming on. Was that matter discussed, and is there in contemplation any shelter for the soldiers who are detailed as guards on the bridges?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The matter was not discussed. My recollection is, and my understanding is, that the men of the Regular Army and the National Guard will not be detailed to that work.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Even the conscripted man is a human being.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said that I understood that no one in the Army is to be detailed to that work.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are. Every large bridge, every road bridge is now guarded by our soldiers, and in some instances they are within the sweep of the storm.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not in my State. The railroad bridges and conduits are guarded by members of the Home Defense Guard, who are rendering very efficient service. The War Department, however, has ample funds to provide all the shelter that is needed for troops in the field.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from New York know whether or not it is contemplated before the winter comes on to make preparation for the shelter of these men?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding is that they are not to be engaged in the work. The men who were detailed to guard the Conduit Road here have been taken away, and provision has been made to enable watchmen to be employed in their place.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Practically every railroad bridge in the country is guarded by soldiers who are detailed for that work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I understand they are to be taken from that work. We can not raise an army for service in the field and detail them to guard the bridges all over the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But they are there now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have been assigned temporarily, but they are not to continue, according to the information furnished to me.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Has it not been a part of the policy of the War Department in sending these various squads of soldiers—I shall not call them companies—around to guard bridges that it was to give the soldier some training during the summer months, and while getting that training he has been guarding public property, and that when the weather becomes cold they will be taken off that work, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] suggests?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If that is true, then there is no necessity for building shelters; but I know that men have stood out in the storm and rain without any kind of shelter whatever.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, the various tunnels between here and the West are guarded by soldiers, but I think in every case they have tents. I think they have shelter provided by the Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have seen them very recently standing out in the open—standing out without any shelter of any kind whatever.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is when they are on guard duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You can not put soldiers in a box when they are on guard duty.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is the easiest thing in the world. They are guarding these public buildings from boxes.

Mr. ROBBINS. The Pennsylvania National Guard was detailed to that work. They took their tents and sent them to the various places, and they had them at the tunnel or near the bridge, and of course these soldiers have to walk through the tunnels and under the bridges. That is a part of the soldier's duty. He does that in all kinds of weather. The gentleman has been a soldier, and so have I. There is no difficulty about that at all. They are properly protected, so far as the State of Pennsylvania is concerned, as I have observed between here and Pittsburgh on both the Baltimore & Ohio and the Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can take the gentleman within an hour to bridges where there is absolutely no shelter of any kind whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters, seacoast defenses: For construction of temporary barracks and quarters at seacoast posts for the accommodation of officers and enlisted men of the Coast Artillery, $2,000,000.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 2, on page 17, insert the following:

"Enlargement and reclamation of Fort Taylor, Key West, Fla.: For the acquisition of additional land, for the filling in of such parts of land so purchased and other parts of the reservation as may be necessary, and for the construction of a sea wall, Fort Taylor, Key West, Fla., $350,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment seeking an appropriation for Key West, Fla., and I think the wisest thing that I could do would be to read to the Members of the House what occurred at the hearings before the committee and also some of the reports. Beginning on page 587 of the hearings, I read from the testimony of Capt. Crain:

Capt. CRAIN. This request is due to the fact that all the armament at Key West is now located at Fort Taylor, and the tract on which the garrison has been located in the past and is now located is Key West Barracks, which is about a mile and a half distant from Fort Taylor, the town of Key West lying in between. The reservation of Key West Barracks is too small for the development of the garrison, and also the Florida East Coast Railway obtained submerged land on the outside of this reservation and filled it in so that Key West Barracks is situated right on the inner edge of this railroad yard. In 1909 a hurricane destroyed most of the buildings, and rather than rebuild in an unsuitable location the garrison was reduced to one company for a number of years. The project has been to increase the area at Fort Taylor and locate the barracks and quarters that are necessary on the Fort Taylor Reservation. An appropriation was obtained in 1906, I believe, of $100,000, and a part of the desired tract was purchased. This tract, however, was not sufficiently large to meet the requirements, so that this item is introduced to provide the additional land necessary to complete the filling in that should be done and to provide a sea wall.

The CHAIRMAN. How large a tract of land have you there now?

Capt. CRAIN. About 72 acres, all told, at Fort Taylor and about 23 acres at Key West.

The CHAIRMAN. How much do you propose to buy?

Capt. CRAIN. About 12 acres. But it is subdivided into blocks, being right on the edge of the city of Key West.

The CHAIRMAN. That is about $12,500 an acre?

Capt. CRAIN. Yes, sir; it is town property. It is right on the edge of the city of Key West.

Mr. SHERLEY. Have you stated how much of the $350,000 is for the fill and how much for the land?

Capt. CRAIN. About $150,000 is for the land, about $100,000 for the sea wall, and about $100,000 for the fill.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of a sea wall do you expect to build?

Capt. CRAIN. I do not know the exact length of it, but I believe it will be about 4,250 feet long.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, with the acquisition of this 12 acres, what would then be the situation at Fort Taylor?

Capt. CRAIN. They will then be able to provide quarters and barracks and storehouses for the garrison which it is contemplated will be put there, which will be about 600 regular Coast Artillery men, and when the militia are called out about 400 additional militiamen, making a total of about 1,600 men.

The CHAIRMAN. Have we any reservation right near there?

Capt. CRAIN. None, except Key West Barracks, which is on the other side of the city of Key West, about a mile and a half away, and which I have described to you, and which is really unsuitable for the purpose, and a small reservation of about 18 acres, which is equally distant from Fort Taylor and Key West Barracks, about 1½ miles from each, and which now contains fire-control stations, a searchlight, and a battery.

On page 22 of the report from the Secretary of War under a footnote I find the following:

This estimate is submitted in accordance with instructions of the Secretary of War. The acquisition of the land, the construction of the sea wall and the filling in of the land are imperatively necessary to prepare accommodations for the troops to be stationed at Fort Taylor, Key West, Fla.

Mr. Chairman, with the strongest recommendation from the Secretary of War that it is possible to secure, I come before the members of this committee appealing to them to vote for this proposition as a worthy one. I have no desire to criticize the Committee on Appropriations, and what I may say in my few remarks will not be intended with that purpose in view. A few weeks ago when the river and harbor appropriation bill was before this House for consideration, in discussing an appropriation for Key West, I was told by some of the Members they could not support it because it did not have the unqualified indorsement of the War and Navy Departments. I could not get that indorsement and I lost that appropriation by a few votes. Now it seems that I meet myself coming back, for when I get this strong indorsement of the War Department saying this sea wall should be built and this land purchased and filled, that it is imperatively necessary to properly provide for the troops, I am informed by the Committee on Appropriations that they must cut down their expenses, and therefore Key West can not get a dollar. So that really I do not know whether I am coming or going. It seems to me, and I hope I am not too severe, that perhaps Key West is not appreciated by the committee and they have forgotten it is a part of the United States.

Therefore, they have begun their cut in that section. Let me call attention to the fact that—and, as I said, without any criticism—Philadelphia, Frankford Arsenal, is getting in this bill $1,145,000 for the purpose of establishing target ranges, putting new roofs on the buildings, building new buildings, improving it, and so forth.

Rock Island is getting $1,420,200 for the purpose of getting new rooms, increasing railroad transportation facilities, and so forth, in the sum of $90,000 of said amount. Massachusetts gets $682,000 for extension of office buildings, light equipment, buildings, stores, and so forth. I find that West Troy, N. Y., is getting $789,500, and the War Department said it was necessary; and we have just increased it, upon the motion of the chairman of this committee, making it something over $800,000. I voted for the amendment because I think the War Department thinks it is wise. But when it said it is imperatively necessary to have an appropriation to take care of the troops at Key West, Fla., it is absolutely impossible to get one dollar in this bill. I am not opposed to the Philadelphia appropriation; I am not opposed to the appropriation in Massachusetts; nor am I opposed to the one for New York. I have repeatedly said to the Members of this House that I trust the day will never come when I will be so small as to vote against an appropriation simply because it does not affect my district. On this same broad ground I appeal to the members of this committee to give to Key West that to which she is entitled and that which she has been unable to get, for no appropriation has been made to Key West since 1906.

One of the generals of the War Department, who is up on coast artillery and an expert on the proposition, stated to me that in his opinion there was not a post in the United States more important from a coast artillery standpoint than was the post at Key West, Fla. There, stuck out at the extreme point of that State of which I am proud—Florida—extending into the Gulf of Mexico and the ocean as it does, protecting the Florida East Coast Railway, over which all of your shipments must be made to Cuba and South America, if a German raider should get over here at the present time unless you give this port the proper protection you will wake up to find, too late, you have delayed the appropriation to which she is entitled. Now, that members of this committee may exactly understand the situation I have here a map. This is Fort Taylor on the map. They reach Fort Taylor by going across a bridge here. Here are the Key West Barracks, or rather what was left of them after the hurricane of 1909. These buildings which were not destroyed have not been remodeled because, as stated in the report, the department realized it would be absurd to have your men a mile and a third away on so small an area, and one too small to make the necessary improvements for the men they contemplate. These men are forced to walk through the city of Key West every time they are called out to drill. Of course that is immaterial—a mile and a third to walk for the purpose of drilling. This space is limited, and the department now desires to build a sea wall running over here down to this point marked in black and from there over to about that point, four thousand two hundred and some-odd feet, filling that all in, so that they will have a drill ground of a proper size, and then purchase 12 acres here and provide for a reservation and suitable proper permanent improvements that should be made. I read an article the other day, written by some critic of the foreign situation, which it seems to me is in point and applies to this appropriation, and that was that if the allies would wake up and study the map in order to realize the importance of Italy's charge that was being made and advances they had made they would realize the importance of same and would keep them supplied with guns and ammunition, and by so doing possibly this war could be brought to a speedy conclusion.

I am almost compelled to say to the Members of Congress and to my colleagues, if you would wake up and realize that Florida is a part of the United States, and that we are entitled to some appropriations, especially when the department says they are imperative and necessary, that you would give to us these appropriations without my continually having to appear on the floor of the House and make these fights for them. The people of Key West wrote me some time ago that it seemed to them it would almost take a calamity to Key West and that magnificent railroad, which has come to be one of the eight wonders of the world, would have to be swept from the map before Congress would realize that they were a part of the United States. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that that condition really exists; but when I tell you that Jacksonville, Fla., has a population of over 100,000, and they can not even get two cannon to protect the city; when I tell you Miami, the magic city that has grown 25,000 in population in 15 years, and one of whose citizens has about completed a residence that will cost approximately $7,000,000, has not a single gun to protect it, and down at Key West, this island city, with antiquated barrack buildings, and this fort with no parade ground and no drill ground, is unable to secure $350,000 in a bill carrying approximately $5,000,000,000, it does seem to me there are some grounds for their fears. I read to you before a letter from the Secretary of the Navy stating he realized the importance of Key West from a military and a naval standpoint, and that all of their plans contemplated improvements at Key West. I read to you a letter, when the rivers and harbors bill was up, from the Secretary of War telling you then in the strongest terms possible that he appreciated the importance of Key West from a strategic standpoint, from a defensive and offensive standpoint, and I come to you to-day, my colleagues, with their indorsement that it is imperatively necessary that the appropriation be made that suitable buildings may be built and that these men may be suitably housed and have suitable training grounds. Only one company was left there for a number of years, and the War Department desires this appropriation in order that they may provide suitable quarters and barracks for 800 or more men.

Unless these improvements are made it will be impossible for them to properly care for the number of men which it is necessary for the department to have at Key West.

I appeal to your fairness when you vote on this amendment. I do not think it worth while to take up more of your time. The mere fact that in this bill they are appropriating in one place $12,000,000 for land and for building houses would not justify this appropriation unless we are entitled to it. The mere fact that there was in the bill $3,000,000 for the purchase of Key Island, which went out on a point of order, would not justify me in seeking this appropriation unless you feel I am entitled to it. But I do appeal to my colleagues, in view of the testimony, in view of the report of the War Department, regardless of what State you come from, to give to Key West this appropriation, if I have convinced you they are entitled to it.

Let me say to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky that I believe no one is better informed concerning appropriations and fortifications than he, and I do not believe he will oppose it. It is not in a spirit of complaint that I have referred to the committee. As I say, I am glad these other States were given their appropriations, because I feel they are as justly entitled to it as is Key West.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just in conclusion. I know the Members are going to vote one way or the other as each one sees it, and I believe every man who wants to do justice will vote for this appropriation. It will not increase the bill—because it has been cut $3,000,000—and besides it only gives us what we are entitled to.

Let me say with some degree of pride that my State is one of the few States when war was declared that gave to the defense of the flag over her quota of men for the Regular Army. My State, I am proud to say, is one of the few States that gave to the National Guard more than her quota of the National Guard. My county, where for 36 years I have lived, and it is with a degree of pride that I tell you this, was not called upon for a single drafted man, but furnished more than her quota to fight for the Stars and Stripes and our country. It is with more pride that I tell you that the city of Key West, that is appealing to you that it may be protected, has had one of the largest Naval Reserves, or Naval Militia, in the country, in proportion to population, and that for the past 8 or 10 or 12 years they have kept up this Naval Militia, and they are to-day ready to fight for their country.

With these facts before you, I believe you will agree with me that we are entitled to this appropriation. I believe that the Members will give it to us. I simply ask you to vote, as you would ask me to vote, on the merits of the appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the items that was not included in the bill, because there is no necessity for it at this time. It involves an expenditure of $350,000, which, if made at this time, would be of no value whatever to the Government in the conduct of this war. The defenses at Key West are located at Fort Taylor. The barracks are at the Key West Barracks, about a mile and a half or a mile and a quarter from the guns. Accommodations are there for 600 men. At Fort Taylor there are 72 acres of land, which was purchased in about 1905 for $100,000. This amendment proposes to buy additional land at a price of $12,500 an acre and for filling certain swamp lands and building a sea wall, and then later to provide for the erection of accommodations for 1,000 men to man the defenses.

One thing that has been impressed upon the committee during the investigations has been the fact that during this war our coast defenses will not be called into action. The situation relative to the possible naval attack is such that no one anticipates the German fleet will escape; but if it should escape, one place that every one would be perfectly certain would not be subject to any assault would be Key West, where Fort Taylor is the main defense.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. I have implicit confidence in the gentleman's wisdom, but not in his ability to see into the future. Can you give a guaranty that that will not happen? Do you rather think that they would overlook Florida, with no defense, and Key West, with inadequate defense, and go to New York, where they have the strongest fort there is in the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the fleet were to come here, if the gentleman could point out any particular end that would be accomplished by the bombardment of Key West and the wasting of munitions that would be so valuable and essential, perhaps he could justify his belief. There is ample land at Fort Taylor at present upon which can be provided a temporary cantonment for which money is appropriated in the bill in the additional men required for the Coast Artillery in order to furnish a full complement for the manning of all the guns. So that we have a situation where within a mile and a quarter, just across the town, are ample facilities for 600 men. The Government owns 72 acres of land where the guns are located, upon which it can very easily and with the money provided erect the temporary cantonment for the 400 men additional. So it would be an indefensible waste of public money at this time, in view of the extraordinary burden that the people are called upon to bear, to expend $350,000 in acquiring land, building a sea wall, and erecting the permanent structures contemplated. Under the circumstances, I trust that the committee will not agree to the amendment proposed.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. As I just read to the members of the committee, the War Department says that this increase is imperatively necessary at Fort Taylor. Of course the chairman is conversant with that report of the War Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am, but, as I pointed out at the Key West Barracks, at the other side of the town of Key West, are permanent barracks for a number of men. At Fort Taylor we have 72 acres of land, and in the pending bill there is carried an item of $2,000,000 out of which it is proposed to build additional temporary quarters at every seacoast defense in the United States. With that money and with the land that is there available, ample facilities will be provided for the necessary additional 400 men.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. Capt. Crain has gone out of the Army. His report says that if this appropriation is made they will then be able to provide for the storehouse and garrison contemplated to be put up there, which will accommodate about 600 coast artillerymen.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what I said.

Mr. SEARS. On page 18, covering the West Troy, N. Y., proposition, I see that the War Department said that was imperatively necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from New York reserved a point of order on the amendment. Does the gentleman desire to recall that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I made it on the ground that it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Florida want to sustain his amendment?

Mr. SEARS. I hope the gentleman will not press his point of order. The bill is practically full of similar propositions. I have not studied that. I thought it was germane to the bill. It is in continuation of a project already under way. It is not a new project. This Fort Taylor has been established; the Government owns it; this is an improvement in that fort. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it is subject to a point of order, I certainly must insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a set of quarters, single family cottage for armament machinist at Fort Grant, $2,700.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is only fair to say that the chairman of the committee is not a free agent in these matters. In the discharge of his functions as chairman it is his duty to protect the bill from amendments that are not in order. Oftentimes he is greatly embarrassed because of his position and the necessity to protect the bill by the interposition of a point of order. While it may be embarrassing to the gentleman not to have the vote taken, yet his position is not nearly so difficult as frequently is the position occupied by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Signal Service of the Army: For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, as follows: Purchase, equipment, and repair of field electric telegraph, radio installations, signal equipments and stores, binocular glasses, telescopes, heliostats, and other necessary instruments, including necessary meteorological instruments for use on target ranges; motorcycles and motor-driven vehicles used for technical and official purposes; professional and scientific books of reference; pamphlets, periodicals, newspapers, and maps, for use in the office of the Chief Signal Officer; war balloons and airships and accessories, including their maintenance and repair; telephone apparatus (including exchange service at mobile army posts) and maintenance of the same; electrical installations and maintenance at military posts; fire-control and direction apparatus and material for Field Artillery; maintenance and repair of military lines and cables, including salaries of civilian employees, supplies, general repairs, reserved supplies, and other expenses connected with the duty of collecting and transmitting information for the Army by telegraph or otherwise, $3,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether this $3,000,000 appropriation is in addition to the large appropriation made the other day of $640,000,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The $640,000,000 is available exclusively for aviation purposes. This money is to supply the equipment essential for the conduct for the Signal Service of the Army in the field. It consists of all classes of material required for telegraph and telephone lines and other methods of providing and transmitting information. It takes in field glasses and matters of that kind.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question. I notice an item here, "Binocular glasses." I presume it is the idea of the appropriation to purchase those for the use of officers in the Signal Corps, perhaps, or in the Aviation Section?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. As a matter of fact, I am advised by men who are in the service as officers that the commissioned officers in the line are obliged to buy their own binoculars—the glasses which they use while on duty. Do you know whether it is the idea to furnish these to the officers of the Signal Corps?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The officers buy these glasses from the Quartermaster's Department. The officer has to pay for his own equipment. The enlisted man is supplied with his equipment. The officer pays for his equipment. The War Department obtains the glasses and the officers purchase them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. They have a special arrangement so that they pay about $33.50 for their glasses. But what is this item for? Is it for glasses for the privates, the enlisted men, or what?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is to get the glasses that are sold to the officers.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The idea, then, is that the Government will get this money back?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I see.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Government gets the glasses, and at present it is developing the manufacture of the lenses, because prior to the war all of the lenses came from Germany.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Government obtains the glasses and then the officers buy them through the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then, as regards this item, the money will ultimately get back to the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that part that is devoted to glasses. That is relatively a small portion of the $3,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY OF THE ARMY.

Officers of the line: For pay of officers of the line, including staff corps of the National Guard, $5,410,377.

Enlisted men of the line: For pay of enlisted men of all grades, including recruits, $244,370,622.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey offers the following amendment: After line 25 on page 19 insert:

"FAMILY ALLOWANCES TO ENLISTED MEN.

"For the payment of family allowances by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, under such rules and regulations as they may respectively provide, for the benefit of the family of every enlisted man, meaning thereby a person, male or female, enlisted, enrolled, drafted, or ordered into active service during the continuance of the war, including noncommissioned and petty officers, whether in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Naval Reserves, National Naval Volunteers, or any other branch of the United States service, while serving pursuant to law with the Army or Navy, $50,000,000. The word 'family' shall include only wife, children, or issue, and dependent mothers, and said regulations may allot and order paid for their support not more than half the pay of the enlisted man according to grade and length of service, excluding all allowances, and that whenever said allotment is insufficient the United States will add thereto and pay a family allowance which shall not exceed $50 a month: Provided also, That the enlisted man, subject to such regulation, may allot his pay to such persons and for such purposes as he may direct, and if less than half his pay be allotted such regulations may require that the rest thereof shall be held to his credit during any required period and bear interest at 4 per cent per annum, with semiannual rests, and be payable after such period to the enlisted man or his executors, administrators, or assigns."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is new legislation.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly sure that it is subject to a point of order, but I ask the gentleman from New York to reserve his point of order for three minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This matter was debated practically for a week when the insurance bill was under consideration.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. And because it was subject to debate for weeks, it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us. These men are now in the Army; most of them are married men with families. The most of them are going to France within a few weeks. The evidence is being taken away and the chance of providing for these men easily and promptly is being destroyed.

This is only a temporary matter until the bill goes through that will provide for it permanently. But even if it is only for a week or so, this provision ought to be made for the men now in, to be taken care of as it was at the border, by Army regulation, so that when they are enlisted or drafted they can find out exactly what the families are, so that the evidence may be preserved.

In this bill it will pass right away, and it ought to be provided for without being mixed up with disputed questions in reference to how much insurance men shall take out or what pensions in the name of compensation shall be granted. I submit to the gentleman that if it was right to do this in this way during the troubles at the border it is right to do it in this way as a temporary measure now, as it was temporary then. I appeal to the gentleman not to make the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman ought not to put me in the position of interfering with this legislation. My recollection is that he proposed the same subject matter as this when the soldiers' insurance bill passed the House by a unanimous vote, or when it was under consideration last week. This matter has not been called to my attention as something that ought to be put in this bill. The Committee on Appropriations was eight weeks in its consideration, and it is unfair to ask me, without being able to take time to ascertain what is in the provision, to permit him to have such legislation of this character put upon the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? This was proposed to the Committee on Appropriations; it was handed in through the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET]. It was printed in the Record with notice that I was going to bring it up at this time, and I gave notice on the floor in a speech, and I really tried to do all that I could.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman had been as busy during the past eight weeks as I have been he would not have had time to read the Record and find out what gentlemen propose to offer as amendments. It is only about 40 or 50 feet from where the gentleman stands to the committee room.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I want to say that I did all that I could. I ask the gentleman now to consider it and see whether it ought not to go into the bill as a temporary measure before the bill is passed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). Does the gentleman from New York withdraw his point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, Mr. Chairman; I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Headquarters of the several territorial departments, territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, and service schools: For additional clerks, from October 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918, inclusive, at annual rates of compensation, as follows: Fifteen at $2,000 each, 32 at $1,800 each, 120 at $1,600 each, 318 at $1,400 each, 895 at $1,200 each, 370 at $1,000 each; in all, $1,626,600.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is it the idea of the committee in placing this limitation as to availability until June 30 next that these clerks shall be included in the regular appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman refers to the clerks at headquarters of the several departments. Provision for such clerks belongs in the Army bill. The force required for the transaction of business of a mobile army belongs there, and their number depends entirely upon the size of the army. For every additional number of men or units a certain number of additional clerks are required.

Mr. STAFFORD. These are not Army field clerks; these are civilian clerks, I presume.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These are clerks assigned at field headquarters known as Army field clerks. Every brigade has headquarters, every division has headquarters, every corps has headquarters, every army has headquarters. The more troops, the larger the organization, the larger the number of headquarters. It is impossible to state with accuracy the number required, but the committee had to provide liberally so that the essential paper work of the Army in the field could be conducted without any delay.

The gentleman also recalls that the system is to be perfected by which a complete record is to be kept of every man in the Army, and in order to have that information available upon call in Washington it will require a very large force of men in the field so that the information can be collated, arranged, and transmitted promptly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I assume that these clerks are also to perform the work contemplated by the department in ascertaining from the conscriptive force the various vocations and avocations they have pursued, so as to place them into the arm of the service for which they are best suited.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The War Department is attempting immediately on the assembling of these men in the camps to gather accurate information regarding the qualifications, professions, and occupations of every man in the Army.

So that when it shall become necessary to organize a force of men with special qualifications, that data will be all available, and it can be quickly gathered, and these clerks will do the clerical work for every purpose connected with the Army.

Mr. REED. Are some of these Army clerks to be selected from the drafted men that go to the cantonments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MADDEN. They are not enlisted men at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are not selected from the drafted men. My information is that men eligible for the draft and physically qualified are not accepted for these positions.

Mr. REED. An inquiry comes to me to know whether or not some men drafted who have special qualifications for clerical work could be designated by the commanding officer or those having authority to select such clerks for service in line with the special qualifications of such enlisted men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The effort is made by the department to obtain men for these positions who are above the draft age. No drafted men, if they are physically qualified to be soldiers, will be accepted for this work. If physically qualified for soldiers, they will have qualifications for soldiers which are not required of men to do this clerical work.

Mr. ROBBINS. Are these clerks known as civilian employees selected from the civil-service eligible list, or are they appointed because of political reason or through favoritism?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are not appointed from any patronage list of mine.

Mr. ROBBINS. Nor from mine; but I have heard of the 15,000 clerks, and I know that I never got any of them as a Republican, and I thought probably the Democrats did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman need not feel lonesome. He has distinguished company. I am enrolled under the banner.

Mr. ROBBINS. To be serious, I ask for information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that these clerks are not intended to be from the classified service. Gen. McCain stated that they are selected, except the temporary ones—the men who had to be obtained at once—after written examination, which is similar to that in the civil service, with the changes made necessary by their status as field clerks, and that they are subject to court-martial and the like. They are not in the classified service.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is what I wanted to know, because I was in the Army myself in 1898, and we had a class of people known as civilian clerks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These are the clerks.

Mr. ROBBINS. These are the same class?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one year's pay to beneficiaries of officers and enlisted men who die as the result of aviation accidents, $495,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question with reference to this sum of $495,000 to pay beneficiaries of officers. Is not that covered by the insurance proposition which we passed the other day? Would not this item be unnecessary if that becomes a law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is to carry out existing law. I am not sufficiently familiar with the details of the soldiers' insurance bill as it passed to know whether it supplants this provision. The gentleman is aware that special provision was made for men in the aviation section, and as long as that law continues if any accidents occur resulting in injuries or death of those whose relatives would be entitled to benefit we must make provision for them. I have not examined the insurance law sufficiently carefully to know whether it substitutes provisions for the special provision for the Aviation Service, but even if it did, until that becomes a law we must make provision for the beneficiaries under the existing law. This sum of $495,000 is not based on any accurate information. Five thousand dollars had been appropriated, and all the department could say was that if we had many men engaged in aviation during the year with resulting casualties there should be a fund available to make prompt settlements with the beneficiaries. The committee believed this was an instance in which it was desirable to put at the disposal of the department a sufficiently large sum to enable it to meet any liabilities arising under that law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the gentleman will recall, there was a provision in the soldiers' relief bill that specially provided that the soldier or officer or their beneficiaries in order to receive the benefits of the bill as passed by the House should not be the recipient of any funds by reason of any other allowance. If the beneficiaries of the deceased officer or soldier should receive benefits under this provision they would not be entitled to the emoluments and privileges under the bill we passed last week.

Mr. ROBBINS. That answers the question. If they had relief here under this provision they could not obtain it under the bill we passed last week.

Mr. STAFFORD. They would not be eligible under the bill we passed last week to any privilege under that bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. On pages 20 and 21 I notice that the officers' allowances are in five departments and that there is about $50,000,000 for officers alone. This is a deficiency bill. Is that the case of an increase of officers over the Regular Establishment or why would it be in a deficiency bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act providing for the creation of an army of a million necessitates about 46,000 officers. There were available, if I recall correctly, in the neighborhood of 17,000, so that it was necessary to obtain 27,000 or 28,000 additional. We are anticipating to some extent the calling out of troops that are not already called out. In addition the officers required for the troops necessary to replace wastage have to be provided. In the last deficiency bill we appropriated for officers and men upon the basis of an estimate of a million men in the service eight months of the year. This bill provides additional funds upon the theory that we shall have a million and a half men in service a full year. That is due to the fact that about the 1st of August or September we then had nearly 800,000 men. The number of officers is determined by the number of men. The pay is a matter of computation, and the Regular Army appropriation act only provided for the Regular Military Establishment, and in the National Army we have all the additional officers. We have now all the additional officers required by the increase of the Regular Army to its full authorized strength. We have all the officers of the National Guard, who have been taken into the Federal service, and we will have all the officers drafted into the service, so that makes a number of officers no one contemplated when the Regular Army bill became a law.

Mr. FESS. Have we any figures to show the percentage of the total cost that would be paid to the officers in comparison with the enlisted men of the Army? There is a good deal of talk about there being so much paid to the officer. I do not share in that feeling, but I would like to know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The reason why the officers are paid more is, of course, it has always been recognized he has commissioned rank, and there is another matter that ought to be stated in connection with it, and that is that the officer has to provide all his own equipment, and the cost of outfitting and maintaining themselves is a very considerable item.

Mr. FESS. The chairman misunderstood me. I do not share in that criticism, but I was just wondering whether we had any figures on that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman will find on page 375 of the hearings a statement showing the amount of money necessary to pay 86,158 officers and 2,033,345 men for one year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Kentucky will put a statement in the Record which shows the amount paid for a certain number of officers and a certain number of men.

Mr. FESS. All right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So it will be available for the information of Members. The statement is as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriations of the Quartermaster Corps shall be available for the pay of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, and 43 enlisted men of Troop A, North Carolina Cavalry, for one day in April, 1917, and the subsistence of the enlisted men at 40 cents each for one day.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please explain that provision in lines 1 to 5, page 23?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Troop A of the North Carolina Cavalry had been in the service on the Mexican border. It returned and was mustered out. The commanding officer of the department in which North Carolina is located, I think it is now the Southeastern, and it was then the Eastern division, not knowing that they had been mustered out ordered them on some special duty and they responded. It was then ascertained that they were not in the Federal service; they were immediately directed to quit. Having been mustered out of the Federal service there was no authority to pay their subsistence. This merely authorizes the allowance of the subsistence for one day for which they rendered service although not in the Federal service. In view of the fact they had responded to order, although not in the service and had rendered the service they were called upon to render, the committee felt it is only proper that the regular allowance for the ration for subsistence for that day should be authorized to be paid.

The Clerk read as follows:

Subsistence of the Army: Purchase of subsistence supplies: For issue as rations to troops, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, civil employees when entitled thereto, hospital matrons, nurses, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, general prisoners of war (including Indians held by the Army as prisoners, but for whose subsistence appropriation is not otherwise made), Indians employed with the Army as guides and scouts, and general prisoners at posts; for the subsistence of the masters, officers, crews, and employees of the vessels of the Army transport service; hot coffee for troops traveling when supplied with cooked or travel rations; meals for recruiting parties and applicants for enlistment while under observation; for sales to officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, while on active duty, and enlisted men of the Army. For payments: Of commutation of rations to the cadets of the United States Military Academy in lieu of the regular established ration, at the rate of 40 cents per ration; of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, enlisted men, and male and female nurses, when stationed at places where rations in kind can not be economically issued, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, and when traveling on detached duty where it is impracticable to carry rations of any kind, enlisted men selected to contest for places or prizes in departments and Army rifle competitions while traveling to and from the places of contest, male and female nurses on leaves of absence, applicants for enlistment, and general prisoners while traveling under orders; of commutation of rations in lieu of the regular established ration for members of the Nurse Corps (female) while on duty in hospital, at 40 cents per ration, and for enlisted men, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, and general prisoners sick therein, at the rate of 40 cents per ration (except that at the general hospital at Fort Bayard, New Mexico, 50 cents per ration and at other general hospitals 40 cents per ration are authorized for enlisted patients therein), to be paid to the surgeon in charge; advertising; for providing prizes to be established by the Secretary of War for enlisted men of the Army who graduate from the Army schools for bakers and cooks, the total amount of such prizes at the various schools not to exceed $900 per annum; for other necessary expenses incident to the purchase, testing, care, preservation, issue, sale, and accounting for subsistence supplies for the Army, $175,000,000.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee to explain the provision contained in lines 20 and 21, page 23, "for sales to officers, including officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps, while on active duty, and enlisted men of the Army." What does that provision mean? Now, that is in the subsistence section of the Army.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Officers have to subsist themselves, and this permits them to purchase from the quartermasters the food, and the fund is then reimbursed.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, this language is simply for the purpose of authorizing sales to the officers, and the proceeds are returned to this fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my understanding.

Mr. WINGO. Well, now, what provision is made for the rationing of those men on their way, for instance, to these different posts; reserve officers sent, for instance, to Fort Logan Root; what provision is made for their rationing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman means drafted men?

Mr. WINGO. I have in mind some men who were sent on a long trip who had absolutely no provision made for them whatever for supplies, and the women in one town had to get up at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning to take care of these men and give them food.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection, from reading hastily the directions and regulations of the provost marshal, is that these district boards assemble the men and they select one man to have charge of a squad or group, and he is given authority to buy—

Mr. WINGO. But these are not drafted men I had in mind; they were men already in the service, and I think they were officers or noncommissioned officers and enlisted men about which there was complaint, and they were sent on a train where no provision was made for them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If they are officers, they get a mileage allowance.

Mr. WINGO. Do the noncommissioned officers get a mileage allowance?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A noncommissioned officer, if he is traveling on orders, gets his transportation and he gets his allowance for subsistence.

Mr. WINGO. The majority of these were either commissioned or noncommissioned officers, although there were some enlisted men with them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sufficiently familiar with how it would work out. It may be at times some men will be sent from one place to another where, through some mix up, they might be found without subsistence. If these men traveled without money—

Mr. WINGO. They had money, but there had been no arrangements made, and they could not get any arrangements made at hotels or eating houses. And the ladies of the Red Cross in one town were advised of their predicament and got up before day and prepared food for them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sufficiently familiar with the operations of the military forces to know just how such a situation would be taken care of.

Mr. WINGO. I have not found anybody else that could tell me.

The Clerk read as follows:

Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps: Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Corps, including their care and protection; construction and repair of military reservation fences; stoves and heating apparatus required for heating offices, hospitals, barracks and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States disciplinary barracks; also ranges, stoves, coffee roasters, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts, in the field, and when traveling, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; and the necessary power for the operation of moving-picture machines; authorized issues of candles and matches; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, and enlisted men, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty; contract surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts; for officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902; for sale to officers, and including also fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts; for post bakeries, including bake ovens and apparatus pertaining thereto, and the repair thereof; for ice machines and their maintenance where required for the health and comfort of the troops and for cold storage; ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and offices at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; for the construction, operation, and maintenance of laundries at military posts in the United States and its island possessions; for the authorized issues of laundry materials for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances, and for applicants for enlistment while held under observation; authorized issues of soap; for hire of employees; for the necessary furniture, textbooks, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries and for textbooks for noncommissioned officers' schools, including subscriptions for newspapers, periodicals, and magazines for use of enlisted men, as may be authorized by the Secretary of War; for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts; for purchase of relief maps for issue to organizations, commercial newspapers, market reports, etc.; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men, including recruits; for forage, salt, and vinegar for the horses, mules, oxen, and other draft and riding animals of the Quartermaster Corps at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, and for the horses of the several regiments of Cavalry and batteries of Artillery and such companies of Infantry and scouts as may be mounted; for remounts and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; for seeds and implements required for the raising of forage at remount depots and on military reservations in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands and for labor and expenses incident thereto, including, when specifically authorized by the Secretary of War, the cost of irrigation; for straw for soldiers' bedding, stationery, typewriters and exchange of same, including blank books and blank forms for the Quartermaster Corps, certificates for discharged soldiers, and for printing department orders and reports, $100,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the committee please explain what is meant by the use of the term "general prisoners," at the end of line 11 and at the beginning of line 12, on page 26? What is meant by the expression "general prisoners"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand they are the ordinary prisoners of the Army. This is the term used in the appropriating provision of the Army act, and in making appropriations for deficiencies we carry the exact language of the original law. My understanding is that the term "general prisoner," however, relates to the ordinary military culprit. That is the technical, common method of describing him. There may be a prisoner who would be a prisoner of war, but if he is a general prisoner they distinguish him in this way.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the expression "general prisoner" would mean one of our own soldiers or sailors, men in the military or naval service of the Government, who was in prison?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of our own soldiers. This is the Army item.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I mean one of our own soldiers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in line 7, page 26, I ask unanimous consent to change the word "offices" to "officers."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment as indicated will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses, Quartermaster Corps: Postage; cost of telegrams on official business received and sent by officers of the Army, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, when ordered to active duty; extra pay to soldiers employed on extra duty, under the direction of the Quartermaster Corps, in the erection of barracks, quarters, and storehouses, in the construction of roads, and other constant labor for periods of not less than 10 days; as additional school-teachers during the school term at post schools, and as clerks for post quartermasters at military posts, and for overseers of general prisoners at posts designated by the War Department for the confinement of general prisoners, and for the United States disciplinary barracks guard; of extra-duty pay at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of War for mess stewards and cooks at recruit depots, who are graduates of the schools for bakers and cooks, and instructor cooks at the schools for bakers and cooks; for expenses of express to and from frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to officers or agents of the Quartermaster Corps to trains where military escorts can not be furnished; authorized office furniture, authorized issues of towels; hire of laborers in the Quartermaster Corps, including the care of officers' mounts when the same are furnished by the Government, and the hire of interpreters, spies, or guides for the Army; compensation of clerks and other employees to the officers of the Quartermaster Corps, and clerks, foremen, watchmen, and organist for the United States disciplinary barracks, and incidental expenses of recruiting; for the apprehension, securing, and delivering of deserters, including escaped military prisoners, and the expenses incident to their pursuit, and no greater sum than $50 for each deserter or escaped military prisoner shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be paid to any civil officer or citizen for such services and expenses; for a donation of $5 to each dishonorably discharged prisoner upon his release from confinement under court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge; for the following expenditures required for the several regiments of Cavalry, the batteries of Field Artillery, and such companies of Infantry and Scouts as may be mounted, the authorized number of officers' horses, and for the trains, to wit, purchase of picket ropes, blacksmith's tools and materials, horseshoes, and blacksmith's tools for the Cavalry service, and for the shoeing of horses and mules; chests and issue outfits; and such additional expenditures as are necessary and authorized by law in the movements and operations of the Army, and at military posts, and not expressly assigned to any other department, $8,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee one question. In line 10, page 29, is the language, "for a donation of $5 to each dishonorably discharged prisoner upon his release from confinement under court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge." He might be 2,000 miles from home, and $5 would do nothing for him. If you are going to give anything to him, why do you not give him enough so that he can get home?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that the discharged soldier who is in prison is transported to the place of his enlistment upon his discharge. He is given a suit of civilian clothing and $5 in cash in order to start him in life.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will note from that language that he is to be paid $5 upon his release from confinement. For example, he might be confined at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. If he were released from that confinement, they would hand him $5?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I stated upon his discharge from confinement under court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge. If he has been convicted of an offense which results in his dishonorable discharge, it is accompanied by a penalty by which he forfeits all pay and allowance. Therefore, when he is discharged he has no money coming to him from his pay account. So he is furnished with transportation from the place of his confinement to the place of his enlistment. He is given a suit of civilian clothes, which costs about $10, and he is given $5 in cash with which to provide any little luxury that he may require on his trip.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I ask the chairman's attention to the appropriation for travel allowance for such discharged soldiers from disciplinary barracks or other place of confinement, as found at the bottom of page 30 of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I stated that they were transported.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, does the chairman of the committee recall at the moment what allowances are made to the enlisted man when he is given an honorable discharge?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No allowances are given to him when he has an honorable discharge.

Mr. WINGO. Is he given transportation back home?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that he is entitled to transportation to the place of his enlistment.

Mr. WINGO. Now, the man who gets a dishonorable discharge gets this $5 donation, which is more than a man receives who gets an honorable discharge?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is this, that the man who has a dishonorable discharge has been usually confined for a considerable period in a military prison. All of his pay and allowances have been forfeited, so that at the time of his discharge he has no account which has to be adjusted by the payment to him of a certain sum in settlement of his account. He is discharged without anything. And it has become the practice to give him this gratuity.

The enlisted man who terminates his service by the termination of his enlistment, or by reason of some physical disability, when his accounts are adjusted usually has coming to him a considerable sum.

Mr. WINGO. So that is the reason why this $5 donation is given to the dishonorably discharged man?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; because he is absolutely without means.

Mr. WINGO. Because when he is dishonorably discharged he forfeits his accumulated allowances?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that is all that he will have.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to the provision to which he refers on line 21, page 30, for traveling expenses:

For travel allowance to persons on their discharge from the United States disciplinary barracks or from anywhere in which they have been held under a sentence of dishonorable discharge and confinement for more than six months.

But suppose he is not in confinement for more than three months?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I venture the suggestion that their pay and emoluments are only forfeited when they are sentenced for imprisonment more than six months.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Evidently he does not get his transportation. I do not know why this particular period was determined upon, but it is the practice.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But if the statute in precise terms gives to a man who has been in confinement for six months a traveling allowance, no man who has not been confined for six months would, under this statute, get any traveling allowance, because the mention of one thing is the exclusion of the other in statutory construction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to that I shall agree with the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought the gentleman would agree to it. Now, then, what becomes of the man who has been in confinement for three or four or five months?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He is handed $5 on his discharge, to indulge in those luxuries that the gentleman spoke of awhile ago, but he can not go home.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sufficiently familiar, let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, with the ways of unfortunate men who have dishonorable discharges to be able to discuss their situation, and I am not familiar with the practice of the department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is an important point the way this statute reads.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a matter that has been settled by years of practice. The reason for this particular distinction I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, including the cost of packing and crating; for transportation of recruits and recruiting parties; of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruiting depots; for travel allowance to officers and enlisted men on discharge; for payment of travel allowance as provided in section 126 of the act approved June 3, 1916, to enlisted men of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States, and to members of the National Guard who have been mustered into the service of the United States and discharged on account of physical disability; for payment of travel pay to officers of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States, as prescribed in the act approved March 2, 1901; for travel allowance to persons on their discharge from the United States disciplinary barracks or from any place in which they have been held under a sentence of dishonorable discharge and confinement for more than six months, or from St. Elizabeth's Hospital after transfer thereto from such barracks or places, to their homes (or elsewhere as they may elect), provided the cost in each case shall not be greater than to the place of last enlistment; of the necessary agents and other employees, including per diem allowances in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 for those authorized to receive the per diem allowance; of clothing and equipment and other quartermaster stores from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipment; of ordnance and ordnance stores, and small arms from the foundries and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; for payment of wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; for transportation of funds of the Army; for the hire of employees; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on condition that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charge for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided roads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provision only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation for such Government transportation as shall at that time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: And provided further, That nothing in the preceding provisions shall be construed to prevent the accounting officers of the Government from making full payment to land-grant railroads for transportation of property or persons where the courts of the United States have held that such property or persons do not come within the scope of the deductions provided for in the land-grant acts; for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies, and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the hire of teamsters and other employees; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, $350,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether the phraseology of this paragraph, which consists of three pages and a half, is identical in language with that of the existing law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The language of this provision is identical with the language of the Army appropriation bill, with two slight changes. The title of the Government Hospital for the Insane is carried in its proper form—"St. Elizabeth's Hospital," and the provision for the transportation of supplies furnished to the militia for the permanent equipment thereof is eliminated, because there is no such transportation at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the gentleman the limitation which is found on page 32, lines 12 to 20, "not to exceed 50 per cent for transportation charged to private parties," is now existing law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This language is identical, and payment up to 50 per cent is made under a decision of the Supreme Court. Land-grant roads brought some suits a great many years ago—40 years ago—and the Supreme Court held that they were entitled to compensation for the use of the rolling stock and equipment up to 50 per cent of the charges made to the general public, and these are the provisions that are carried in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the subcommittee make any inquiry as to the means and the railroads that are utilized in the transportation of the Army from northern camps to southern camps and cantonments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. Some of the Members knew that the facilities of the railroads would be overtaxed in transporting these men, and that the railroads themselves, by means of a committee, were attempting to so arrange matters that the men could be transported without inconvenience. I had that information because of conversations with men in charge of the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the Government utilizing the land-grant roads for the transportation of the troops wherever it is possible and obtaining the reduced rates, or is the Government sending troops indiscriminately over any roads that may be favorably situated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. WINGO. Were any representations made to the committee with reference to claims of the railroads that the extraordinary demands upon them by reason of the present emergency were beyond those contemplated at the time of these grants, and did they ask for relief? Was there any representation made by the railroads to get relief?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee had one matter presented to it. The Missouri Pacific has obtained control of roads 180 miles long in Illinois. Its original grant in 1853 was identical with the grant under which the land-grant railroads are now being compensated. In 1866 the grant was revived and extended and a provision inserted that made it somewhat different, and the War Department has held that under the wording of their grant they are entitled to no compensation. A cantonment has been established on their line, where 40,000 men will be assembled. An extraordinary service will be imposed on the road, and a service, in my opinion, that would not be contemplated and that would be very unusual. It may be that this road has very considerable equitable claims for some relief under those circumstances.

Mr. WINGO. But you do not attempt to meet that equitable claim in this bill at all?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not, because we believed it was a matter that should be taken up and adjusted after a more thorough consideration than it would be possible for the Committee on Appropriations to give. It involves a question as to whether or not Congress contemplated any conceivable service that might be imposed, and it involved a question as to the wisdom and desirability of modifying the terms of a land grant, and there were so many other questions of very grave public policy that I was not willing to enter seriously into the consideration of the matter.

Mr. WINGO. I agree with the gentleman that if taken up it should be as a separate proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I might add that my position was fortified by the fact that the matter was not presented by the department, but by a representative of the Missouri Pacific Railroad. It seemed to the committee that if relief of this character was granted, it ought to come before Congress in the form of a recommendation from the department.

Mr. WINGO. And it ought to go as an original proposition to be considered separately. There is nothing in this bill to change the status of the land-grant proposition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is nothing in this bill which changes the present situation. The War Department, under an arrangement which has been made with railroads other, I assume, than land-grant railroads, gets a 5 per cent reduction on passenger transportation.

Mr. WINGO. But that does not affect the question of the land-grant act?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not.

Mr. WINGO. That was my sole purpose to ascertain whether any effort had been made and whether you attempted to meet it in this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only attempt is the one which I have called attention to, and no change was made in the language that has been carried for some time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all the money heretofore appropriated under the titles Subsistence of the Army; Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps; Incidentals, Quartermaster Corps; Transportation of the Army and its supplies; Water and sewer at military posts; and Clothing and camp and garrison equipment shall be disbursed and accounted for by officers and agents of the Quartermaster Corps as "Supplies, services, and transportation, Quartermaster Corps," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if the officers or persons who disburse this fund are any different from the officers who disbursed the funds before the arrangement was made. This provides that it shall constitute one fund. Do the same disbursing officers control all of the other expenditures?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not a new proposition. The practice is, in the Army appropriation bill, after specific appropriations are made for the pay of officers of various grades and enlisted men, to put in a provision which makes all of these amounts one sum to be disbursed by the officers. In the appropriation for transportation of the Army, water, sewers at military posts, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, which are all made specifically for the quartermaster's department, the Army bill carries the provision that they shall constitute one fund and be disbursed as such.

As to the wisdom of that provision there may be some room for argument, but unless these deficiency appropriations are made disbursable in the same manner, then it would be necessary for the quartermaster's department to open new accounts, change their whole system of disbursement and of accounting for the moneys carried in this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What I want to know is this. Such appropriations are made for specific purposes. Can the disbursing officer use any of the money appropriated for one specific purpose for a different purpose than that specifically mentioned?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What happens is this. A disbursing officer will have to his credit money for barracks and quarters, water and sewers, and other matters like transportation. He may not have enough money for water and sewers to meet the vouchers that come to him, but he has funds in the appropriation for barracks and quarters.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is exactly the answer I want.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And under this particular appropriation for the purpose of disbursements it constitutes one fund.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Precisely, so if there is an appropriation for a specific purpose he could, in his discretion, use the money appropriated for another specific purpose to meet the expenditure?

Now, there is, as the gentleman from New York has said, an opportunity for very serious doubts as to the wisdom of any such provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have never commended this practice, but that is the form in which the appropriations were carried in the Army appropriation bill. The Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction only when deficiency appropriations are to be made; however, unless the same language were carried it would so upset and disarrange the system in force that it is much more desirable to have the one system than to have two systems governing the same period.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it is obvious that in making the general deficiency bill, which this is, you must follow the language of the Military Committee, but there are State constitutions which expressly prohibit the expenditure of one penny of money appropriated for a specific purpose for another purpose. There ought not to be any discretion left in the disbursing officer to take money appropriated by Congress for a specific purpose and employ it to meet another expenditure. You put them all into one fund, and it leaves him the whole discretion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It in effect nullifies the segregation of the fund. Congress has been doing it for a great many years. I have called the attention to it at different times of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, who give these matters more immediate attention than I do, but both Houses acquiesce in it, and I do not feel that I am in a position to set my judgment up against theirs.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am free to say that my attention was never called to it until I was reading this provision. I remember that when we enacted the Philippine organic act I took occasion myself in helping to draw that up to take from the constitution of the State of Wisconsin a provision which absolutely prohibits the expenditure of any money appropriated for a specific purpose for another purpose, and that ought to be the law here.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the language in line 16, page 34, issuing housewives to the Army. Will the gentleman explain what that means?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A housewife is a very necessary essential incident to the soldier. It is a kit consisting of sewing material—a seamstress's outfit—needles, pins, thread, buttons, and other accessories with which I am not intimately acquainted—for the convenience of the soldier.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the gentleman from New York will explain lines 22, 23, and 24, for extending the right to collect for clothing destroyed back to the years 1898, covering a period of 19 years? Why has not the item been cared for annually? What proof would there be of clothing lost 19 years ago? That seems to be an unusual provision in this bill, and I would like to ask the gentleman what is the purpose of it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act of April 22, 1898, authorized the reimbursement to officers and enlisted men for clothing and bedding which the medical officers, for sanitary reasons, for the protection of the health of officers and men of the Army, ordered destroyed; and since the passage of that act authority has been contained in this appropriation to make that reimbursable. Sometimes these accounts take some time in going through, but it does not amount to a very considerable sum; and this is not intended to make reimbursements of unsettled accounts in the past to any considerable number, but the bill follows the wording originally adopted, which has enabled the department to keep the settlements of the accounts current.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if any part of the $23,000,000 for water and sewers is to be used at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo.; and if so, how much? Is it contemplated to put an extensive new water system there to bring water a distance in order to meet the failure of the water supply at that fort?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is mostly for the cantonments and the National Guard camps.

Mr. WINGO. This, as I understand it, is limited to water and sewer for military posts already established and not for the cantonments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The detailed statements furnished the committee showed that the water—

Mr. WINGO. Does it show how much is for that particular fort?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no statement showing what is for each particular post, and the money is not intended for the Regular Army posts. This money is the money required for sewer and water accommodations that are being provided for the new army that is being assembled.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman states that this is not for the purpose I have stated, for a new water system for Fort Russell?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe that any of it is intended to be expended at Fort D. A. Russell, in Wyoming; the money is requested for the expenditure in connection with the national cantonments and the National Guard camps. About $19,000,000 are for the National Army cantonments and about $4,000,000 for the National Guard camps.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman recognizes the fact that under the language used here they could take every cent of the $23,000,000 and use it at present existing military posts. As a matter of fact, there is no provision at all for cantonments in this section.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could do it, but if they did so they would not provide the water and sewer facilities absolutely essential for those places where the Army is to be assembled, and there is very little likelihood that the money would be diverted.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, the greater part of this sum would be used for water systems. I take it that the great bulk of the $23,000,000 is to be used for the water system.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The sewer system is expensive, too.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; the sewer and water systems would probably be constructed jointly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the water supply would be the larger part, probably, because the same extent of sewer system does not exist in the National Guard camps, although considerable provision must be made for the water supply.

Mr. WINGO. Here is the point that I had in mind. This does not provide that this money shall be expended at these cantonments, nor even are the cantonments provided for except by necessary implication.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not entirely for that purpose.

Mr. WINGO. Did the hearings show they were going to use this at existing forts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This money was required to complete—

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. One at a time is all that I can yield to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The money was requested to enable the department to furnish sewers and water needed for cantonments and camps. There is available for expenditure during this fiscal year at the Regular Army posts, in addition to the sums requested and recommended because of this emergency construction, $2,000,000. If it were determined by the War Department to be desirable or necessary or expedient to expend a considerable sum at Fort D. A. Russell, in Wyoming, or at any other Regular Army post, the funds are available for that purpose.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the gentleman think that if they wanted to go to the expenditure of three and a quarter million dollars for a new water system for any fort they should go into detail and disclose the fact to the committee so that the committee could disclose that fact to the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they should, and as they have indicated to the committee pretty thoroughly—

Mr. WINGO. They have spent vast sums out of appropriations before without calling the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think there is that danger, but the gentleman asked me if I could give assurance that this money would not be expended at Fort Russell, and as I would have no control over this expenditure after it becomes a law I decline to be a guaranty to that extent.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not think that a large part of this is to be used on that one fort?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. WINGO. I now yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman made inquiries as to whether any part of this appropriation was to be used for a water supply at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo. I am wondering why the gentleman made that inquiry. Would it not be entirely proper to so use it if it were needed?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman asked a question, and I want to answer it. I made the inquiry because, as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, I have literature from both sides of the question as to the water supply at Fort D. A. Russell, and I understand that the citizens out there are very much gratified at the prospect of having a considerable portion of the $23,000,000 expended there, which, of course, must be gratifying to the gentleman from Wyoming, and, if it is true, I am sure the gentleman from Wyoming knows whether it is or not, and I will ask him whether or not it is contemplated—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to reply in my own time.

Mr. WINGO. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he is advised if there is a probability of a considerable sum of this being used for the water supply at Fort D. A. Russell?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall reply to that, if I may have the time.

Mr. WINGO. No; I am exceedingly anxious that this bill should pass.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has said that this is a question—

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman can answer whether he has information or not to throw light on this.

Mr. MONDELL. I take it for granted if any is needed there it will probably be used.

Mr. WINGO. Has the gentleman been advised that there is a large amount needed?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I have not been advised that any very large sum is needed.

Mr. WINGO. Well, I am satisfied because I want to say if there is anything needed there for that purpose that the very diligent gentleman from Wyoming would have found it out first.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume what may be needed for any purpose at that or any other post will be used there. I shall take it for granted that the War Department will do its duty in the expenditure of this money.

Mr. WINGO. Judging from what investigation I have been able to make, I doubt not at all that that fort will be able to get everything it needs and I fear everything it thinks it needs. It has in the past I understand and some things it did not need measured from the standpoint of public necessity.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WINGO. My motion was to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas moved to strike out the section and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming in opposition.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would not take up the time of the committee at this time to discuss the matter that had been referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas if it were not for the fact that the gentleman has stated that his committee has been bombarded by parties, as he says, on both sides of the question of the water supply at Fort D. A. Russell.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield? I know the gentleman wants to be accurate.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman misquoted me. I did not say that. I said that as a member of the committee I had been bombarded with literature, newspaper clippings, and other information, both pro and con, on this question.

Mr. MONDELL. I think if the gentleman will carefully examine what he has received on this subject he may find it is from one source, and these newspaper clippings are old and have no reference to any condition that now exists at Fort D. A. Russell or its water supply.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

It is unfortunately true there is an individual or individuals who, for some reason that nobody seems to be able to understand, seem to be possessed of a spirit of eternal criticism of Fort D. A. Russell and its water supply.

The facts relative to the water supply at Fort D. A. Russell are briefly these: That fort is one of the very largest and one of the very best military posts in the United States. It is a brigade post accommodating all branches of the service. It is splendidly located geographically and with regard to railway transportation, east and west and north and south, main continental lines passing right through it. There is a very large reservation, and adjacent to it there is the Pole Mountain Reserve, covering about a quarter of a million acres of what I believe to be the best maneuvering ground in the United States—plain and mountain and valley, prairie and timber—an endless variety of topography admirably adapted to maneuvering purposes.

The water supply of Fort D. A. Russell in a very early period was not overabundant, because it was taken from the ordinary flow of what was known as Crow Creek. But some years ago the city of Cheyenne, 4 miles from Fort D. A. Russell, in cooperation with the Government, undertook the development of a water supply in the mountains for Fort D. A. Russell and the city of Cheyenne. At a large cost, the major portion of which was borne by the city of Cheyenne and its citizens, a magnificent water supply was provided, water coming right out of the granite hills, stored in one of the finest reservoirs in all the intermountain country, water as pure as crystal and in large quantity. That water reaches Fort D. A. Russell before it reaches the city of Cheyenne, so that the fort has the first command of that magnificent water supply.

Now, so far as I know, no very large additional expenditure is required in connection with that water supply. It is proposed, I think, to make some changes at this time that will improve the post supply, but I do not understand the expenditure for those purposes will be heavy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no proposition on foot, so far as I know, for any immediate large expenditure for water supply. There is a fine supply, one of the finest water systems in the world, and, by the way, it is one of the finest Army posts in the world, I will say to my friend. They are now training there the men of several new regiments of Artillery and the Wyoming regiment—by the way, as fine a body of young Americans as one ever saw. They are utilizing this splendid post and the adjacent reservations for the training of those troops. Of course, if there is a greatly increased number of troops above what the post was intended to accommodate, more water will be needed, and, fortunately, it can be had at an outlay much less than we are now making for some of the new camps and cantonments.

Now, I hope the gentleman, when he hears in the future about the water supply of Fort D. A. Russell, will remember the facts as I have stated. No question can properly be raised with regard to either the quality or quantity of the water supply of that splendid post. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Wingo].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn; and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Horses for Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineers: For the purchase of horses of ages, sex, and size as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for remounts, for officers entitled to public mounts for the Cavalry, Artillery, Signal Corps, and Engineers, the United States Military Academy, service schools, and staff colleges, and for the Indian scouts, and for such Infantry and members of the Medical Department in field campaigns as may be required to be mounted, and the expenses incident thereto, and for the hire of employees: Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number now on hand, shall be limited to the actual needs of the mounted service, including reasonable provisions for remounts, and, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of War, no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster Corps and an inspection under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War. When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market at all military posts or stations, when needed, at a maximum price to be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any horse below the standard set by Army Regulations for Cavalry and Artillery horses, except when purchased as remounts or for instruction of cadets at the United States Military Academy: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for polo ponies except for West Point Military Academy, and such ponies shall not be used at any other place, $30,000,000.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from Wyoming was in error about the things that I had heard about this proposed expenditure at Fort D. A. Russell. I am familiar with the old controversy to which he refers and the gentleman to whom he refers. I may be mistaken, but I was under the impression that the newspaper clippings that were sent to me were for the purpose of trying to forestall any criticism of the proposed expenditure, and they were along the line of trying to show the necessity for it and the wisdom of the Government making the expenditure proposed. But with the assurance of the members of the committee that they know of no proposition to spend vast sums of money for water supply at Fort D. A. Russell, and the assurance of its representative on the floor that he knows of no such proposal, of course I will be satisfied not to pursue the inquiry further. But my past information with reference to the expenditures at that fort caused me to think it wise to make inquiry about any proposition that might permit expenditures under general authorization without specifically authorizing the appropriation for that particular place. I gather that the object of this appropriation is to furnish water supply for the cantonments, although the language does not provide for that. I presume by necessary implication they would say the language used here authorized that, although it is limited to Army posts that now exist and known in legal phraseology as "military posts," as stated under the old existing law. The cantonments under existing law are not military posts, as I understand, in the technical sense of the word.

I hope the assurance the gentleman has given that they do not need any additional expenditures out there will be accepted by the War Department and that there will not be any extraordinary expenditure within the next 12 months at that splendid post to which the gentleman refers. My investigation shows that it should be a splendid post; enough money has been spent on it to make it one.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I give no assurance on my own part, or on any one's behalf, that the War Department will not spend whatever is necessary for the further development of the water supply of Fort D. A. Russell if further development is necessary. Of course the department will do its duty and spend such sums as may be necessary in view of the enlarged use of that post. It is claimed we are spending money lavishly, wastefully on camps and cantonments.

Mr. WINGO. That is the gentleman's justification for wasting money elsewhere?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not justifying waste anywhere, but I am surprised that when it is proposed to put reasonable sums into the proper development of a permanent military establishment, well located and first class in every respect, the gentleman from Arkansas wants to have somebody's assurance that it will not be done.

Mr. WINGO. I did not ask for any assurance. I asked for information which gentlemen are entitled to, but so far I have not gotten any information.

Mr. MONDELL. I have been content to leave it to the officers of the War Department to say where and how these moneys shall be spent. I do not know whether the gentleman from Arkansas can say the same or not, or other gentlemen on that side.

Mr. WINGO. I can. If I had the same experience as the gentleman has had I would take the same position as the gentleman adopts.

Mr. MONDELL. I think we can rely on the War Department to spend this money properly and legitimately and wisely, and if a considerable portion of that should be found to be needed for the further development of the water supply of that fine post, I expect it to be expended. But I am not lobbying for it.

Mr. WINGO. Nobody has accused the gentleman of lobbying for it. But does the gentleman resent a Member of Congress inquiring into the origin of a $23,000,000 appropriation?

Mr. MONDELL. I do rather object to a Member of Congress in whose particular section many millions have been spent, it is claimed lavishly—

Mr. WINGO. Oh, that is not a statement of fact—

Mr. MONDELL. Raising a question as to proper expenditure for the proper development of a permanent piece of Government property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, allow me to conclude this discussion.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit me about three minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Allow me to conclude this discussion by saying that I am not from the South, but I have some information, such as an industrious Member of this House can acquire, about the expenditures for these cantonments, and it is not a fact that money is being expended lavishly and wastefully upon cantonments in the South, whether at places recommended or not recommended by persons in or out of this House. Money is being expended in large sums, and the cost of doing certain work will be higher than in normal times; but that is a different matter from charging that money is being expended either lavishly or wastefully or indefensibly or in any other way that is not proper and commendable.

I hope that every time a controversy arises about a particular matter in which any Member of the House may be specially interested I shall not be called upon to prevent the impression being created—although perhaps there may be some justification—to reiterate what I have had occasion to say several times, that, so far as it has been possible to ascertain as the result of considerable industry, there has not been waste or extravagance in these matters.

I will ask the Members of this House, just out of consideration for me, if for no other reason, not to assert that here is an extravagance or waste or profligate expenditure, or that somebody has asserted it, or that there is a rumor to that effect, or that they heard it from some unknown source, because every time it is charged I intend to deny it. I shall be very glad to investigate it or help investigate any of these rumors, but I know how rapidly these statements travel and how they lodge in the public mind, to the detriment of the official reputation of men unless promptly denied. I am going to undertake to be the official denier of these vague and anonymous whispered assertions that somebody told somebody who was informed by some one else that somebody who had a contract was employing some one under that contract without the knowledge of some one in the War Department in a manner that no one could justify. [Laughter.] Whenever that kind of a statement is made I am going to occupy the position not of the ordinary gentleman from Missouri, but of the historic gentleman from Missouri; I am going to ask to have the charge or the assertion substantiated by something more than that "Somebody told me," and I believe if the Members will think of it a minute they will realize that the most effective way of circulating slander is to state that they heard an atrocious thing about somebody and express the hope that it is not true. [Laughter.] It is much better to keep that character of information to one's self.

With these brief observations, I trust that the committee will proceed with the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that my genial friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] should have resented an inquiry on my part as to the expenditure of $23,000,000. I simply asked for information. Of course I am aware that sometimes it is not in keeping with the proprieties in this House to seek information, especially on expenditures.

I know that some men are exceedingly sensitive about expenditures in their districts, but I had no desire to stir up a hornet's nest or hurt anyone's feelings. I congratulate the gentleman from Wyoming on the fact that he has such a magnificent post, and it ought to be, for we have spent enough money on it. If they do need additional money out there to supplement the already incomparable water supply of the post, as he describes it, if it is necessary to make it superlatively better than it now is—and I do not see how it can be any better than that described in the panegyric of the gentleman—if it is necessary to appropriate three or four millions more to increase it, I shall not object.

However, in all seriousness, I do trust that in the future when he is asked for information the gentleman will not flare up, as he has just done, and charge extravagant expenditures of money in the South by the very same men who have been doing so well for the gentleman at his post.

Some would think that the gentleman regretted that the South was in the Union. Some gentlemen regret that any part of public expenditure is being made in that part of the country. I shall not answer that at all or go into it, but let me make this suggestion. The gentleman says vast sums are being wasted in the South. I, with the gentleman, want to prevent waste, and if the gentleman will undertake to specify the particular cantonment where there has been waste, and who it is responsible for the waste, he can certainly get action before the proper committee, and I will assist him. But I trust the gentleman will not get up in answer to an inquiry for information as to expenditures in his State and denounce expenditure in my part of the country, because that is not an answer to the question and gives no information. I know it is a favorite retort for gentlemen when questioned in regard to a matter and who can not answer the inquiry to abuse the section from which the inquiring Member comes, but the gentleman from Wyoming is too genial, too good natured, he has too great a regard for the proprieties of this House to resort to that kind of an answer, and I am sure he will not do so in the future. I am sure that he will be delighted if I ask him some questions, which I shall do in private, for I do not want to inflict another such situation on the House, and the next time I want information in regard to this wonderful fort I shall go to the gentleman and give him a chance to sing again the praises of its wonderful, incomparable, and inexhaustible water supply.

The Clerk read as follows:

Storehouse for field medical supply depot, from October 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918, inclusive, $36,000; in all, $37,875.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state where the storehouse which is mentioned on page 40, lines 2 and 3, is situated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is over here on the line of the railroad coming into the city at 21 M Street NE., just east of North Capitol Street. There is now a medical supply depot at that place. Because of the very large quantity of supplies for the medical department, which will be distributed from Washington, it was necessary to obtain additional facilities.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It impressed me when I read it that $36,000 was considerable rent for one building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The lease was made under a statute which authorizes the War Department to make a lease for a period of not exceeding six years of a fireproof warehouse, with facilities for storage purposes, at a rate not in excess of 35 cents a square foot. The lease that has been made is for $48,000 a year for 192,000 square feet, and the $36,000 is for nine months' rent. The building is expected to be completed and occupied from the 1st of October. This appropriation is the sum required to meet the terms of the lease for the balance of this fiscal year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Thirty-six thousand dollars is 4 per cent on $900,000, which the Government can borrow easily at 4 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this lease is for only nine months.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; $36,000 for only nine months. I do not wish to be captious at all, but there is nobody on earth that would think of paying any such rent as that except the Government of the United States. It is time that the Government should erect its own buildings in this District. The Democratic Party and the Republican Party, but principally the Democratic Party, has had in its platform for years a demand for economy and the granting of special privileges to none. I think that the acceptance of some of these leases that the Government of the United States has accepted in the District of Columbia is granting a very special privilege to the owners of much of the real estate. We are putting up about $700,000 for rent in this District. Some of them pay for their buildings in 10 years out of the rent and have the buildings clear.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Government needed storehouse facilities. The Republicans in Congress passed a statute authorizing the making of a lease for fireproof warehouses at a rate not in excess of 25 cents a square foot. The lease was made under that statute. The department had no authority to construct the building, but it had authority to make such a lease. While the rental represents 4 per cent upon a certain sum of money, the owner of this building pays taxes. If it is owned by an individual, he pays an income tax; and if it is a corporation it pays a corporation tax. I am not certain what the owner will get out of the rent by the time we get through levying all sorts of taxes on what he will receive. It may be that when we finally finish legislating that he will owe us money because he has made that lease with the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not think there is any danger of anybody being overtaxed in the District of Columbia. I do not think there is any complaint yet of that kind. If so, the complaint is not serious.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The same law will apply to him that applies to me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the gentleman lives in Brooklyn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not felt it yet, but some of my constituents think I am overtaxing myself by supporting the various tax laws.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Forty-eight thousand dollars a year represents an interest of 4 per cent upon an investment of $1,200,000, and there is not any man who has any building worth $1,200,000 which he rents to the Government of the United States up here in the location just mentioned by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch where that location is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is rather indefinite. I do not think it has ever been located exactly—at least in this debate—just where this building is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At 21 M Street NE., just east of North Capitol.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that among those warehouses located up there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is adjacent to the present medical depot.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I will state also that I do not think we ought to have upon the books any statute which leaves any bureau chief or any department head the option to rent buildings—

Mr. FITZGERALD. But we have in this instance.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know we have, but such a statute ought to be repealed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be true, but I have all of the trouble I desire now trying to furnish money to carry out the things that are done under such authorizations without spending any of my leisure time trying to repeal the ones I think undesirable.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman knows very well that there is a well-organized business in this city which consists in inducing the Government to rent buildings upon favorable terms.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the most profitable industry in the city of Washington has been the business of renting accommodations for the Government service. The Committee on Appropriations has tried to curtail the extension of that business by providing for a temporary building with approximately 1,055,000 square feet of floor space for the emergency needs of the Government. In my opinion it is desirable, whenever with reasonable certainty we know that a department is in a fairly settled situation relative to its size, to provide accommodations of a permanent character. The only disadvantage is that it seems almost impossible for the Government to build an ornamental and at the same time highly utilitarian structure for the transaction of public business, although every private concern that requires accommodations can do so and does so. If it were possible to reform the peculiar type of architecture which characterizes the structures of the Federal Government and to adopt a style of architecture that would provide buildings that while chiefly useful would at the same time not be offensive to our esthetic sense, then we could very easily and properly go into a very extensive building program. I hope in time that my views upon this subject will so impress themselves upon everyone connected with the Government service that that result will be accomplished.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Chairman a question. Are these warehouses in the neighborhood of these other warehouses? I think the gentleman has said that they are.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Twenty-one M Street, over on the line of the railroad.

Mr. FOSTER. What I am getting at is this. Does the railroad go up to this warehouse?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It runs past it.

Mr. FOSTER. So that it will not require any extension of track to meet the requirements?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Accompanying this request was a request that authority be given to permit the railroad company to run a spur into this building, authorizing an extension of the railroad tracks over any public streets, squares, and so forth, but the committee thought that was too valuable a right to attach to a lease.

Mr. FOSTER. A law was passed that tracks there should not extend beyond a certain limit, but there has been an effort, a bill introduced in the last Congress to provide for an extension of these tracks out there into these warehouses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. But in this case if these tracks were extended it would ruin some hospital property in that neighborhood, and they were trying to get a repeal of that provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were trying to get specific authority, and the committee declined to recommend it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has not the Government abandoned this super-ornamental style of architecture in the case of the structure it is building now, the new Interior Department Building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has, and the result is very satisfactory from every standpoint.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

Medical and Hospital Department: For the purchase of medical and hospital supplies; gas masks; motor ambulances and motorcycles for medical service, their maintenance, repair, and operation: Provided, That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, select types and makes of motor ambulances for the Army and authorize their purchase without regard to the laws prescribing advertisement for proposals for supplies and material for the Army; disinfectants; typewriting machines for military posts, camps, hospitals, hospital ships, and transports; supplies required for mosquito destruction in and about the military posts in the Canal Zone; veterinary supplies and hire of veterinary surgeons; expenses of medical-supply depots; medical care and treatment not otherwise provided for, including care and subsistence in private hospitals of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army, of applicants for enlistment, and of prisoners of war and other persons in military custody or confinement when entitled thereto by law, regulation, or contract: Provided, That this shall not apply to officers and enlisted men who are treated in private hospitals or by civilian physicians while on furlough; for the proper care and treatment of epidemic and contagious diseases in the Army or at military posts or stations, including measures to prevent the spread thereof, and the payment of reasonable damages not otherwise provided for, for bedding and clothing injured or destroyed in such prevention; pay of male and female nurses, not including the Nurse Corps (female), and of cooks and other civilians employed for the proper care of sick officers and soldiers, under such regulations fixing their number, qualifications, assignment, pay, and allowances as shall have been or shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War; pay of civilian enlistment and enlisted men, and to render other professional services from time to time under proper authority; pay of other employees of the Medical Department; payment of express companies and local transfers employed directly by the Medical Department for the transportation of medical and hospital supplies, including bidders' samples and water for analysis; supplies for use in teaching the art of cooking to the enlisted force of the Medical Department; for the supply of the Army and Navy hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.; for advertising, printing, binding, laundry, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses of the Medical Department, $100,000,000.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some remarks by Hon. CHARLES SULZER, the Delegate from Alaska, who has been called away by the death of his brother. These remarks are upon the Alaska Railroad, the item in this provision of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting in the RECORD some remarks by the Delegate from Alaska, Mr. SULZER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Engineer operations in the field: For expenses incident to military engineer operations in the field, including the purchase of material and a reserve of material for such operations, the construction or rental of storehouses within and outside the District of Columbia, the purchase, operation, maintenance, and repair of horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and such expenses as are ordinarily provided for under appropriations for "Engineer depots," "Civilian assistants to Engineer officers," and "Maps, War Department," $100,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, reading lines 13, 14, and 15, "and such expenses as are ordinarily provided for in appropriations for 'Engineer depots,' 'Civilian assistants to Engineer officers,' and 'Maps, War Department,' $100,000,000." That appears to be in a lump sum and leaves it discretionary with the disbursing officer to use it for any purpose he sees fit. There are no specific appropriations, are there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The appropriation is to cover a great variety of matters. This particular appropriation is for all expenses incident to engineering operations of an army in the field. No one has any adequate knowledge of what possibly will be required or what sum will be required for particular items. It is known that for the operations that are contemplated a very large amount of equipment of all kinds and materials of various characters must be purchased. Some of them will have to be purchased abroad, some will have to be purchased in the United States, and it is one of the peculiar appropriations at this time that is absolutely impossible for anyone to determine for what it shall be expended or the amount required.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there? I had in mind that discussion we had a little while ago about the proviso at the top of page 35.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is different. Under this heading of "Engineer operations in the field" that is all under the Chief of Engineers, and the expenditures are all of a character that properly harmonize. Part will be for steel rails, part for rolling stock, and part for road materials—bridge equipment—and they can not forecast what road material or rolling stock or steel rails they want for an army of a certain number of men.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman does not get the point to which I wish to direct his attention. Has this appropriation been made heretofore for specific purposes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The wording to which the gentleman refers does this: This appropriation is carried in the Army bill in several paragraphs; and in this bill, instead of repeating the language of those paragraphs, this language is used for all purposes enumerated under the same heading in the bill, and in that way the necessity of reprinting the whole paragraph is avoided. It is different from the other matter to which the gentleman called attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores, ammunition: For manufacture and purchase of ammunition for small arms and for hand use for reserve supply, $39,520,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 45, line 8, strike out the sum "$39,520,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$36,000,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Small-arms target practice: For manufacture and purchase of ammunition, targets, and other accessories for small-arms, hand, and machine-gun target practice and instructions; marksmen's medals, prize arms, and insignia for all arms of the service; and ammunition, targets, target materials, and other accessories which may be issued for small-arms target practice and instruction at the educational institutions and State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes to which issues of small arms are lawfully made, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, $2,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 45, line 18, strike out the sum "$2,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$15,000,000."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether in this increase proposed by the amendment he is making it possible for the various colleges that are not military, primarily, but who want to create a military department so as to have military training among their students, to do so?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not. All of this money is to be used in training the men who are actually in the Army to shoot accurately.

Mr. FESS. There are many communications—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know; but the most important thing and the only thing upon which it is essential to concentrate our energies is to train this army we are raising.

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. College training is desirable, but just now, when we are taxing all the resources of the country to acquire money for the army to be put in the field, there can not be much consideration of training boys in colleges to shoot.

Mr. FESS. Will the chairman state whether there are any old guns that are not in use that might be utilized by colleges?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at the present time. For the men who are to be called into the training camps and for the equipment of the men who are now abroad it is necessary to utilize all the rifles that the Government has. We have, all told, something over 900,000 rifles—six hundred and odd thousand Springfields and over 300,000 Krag-Jörgensens. They are all modern rifles. We call the Krag-Jörgensen an obsolete type because it has been discarded for what is considered a much superior rifle—that is, the latest Springfield—but Gen. Crozier states that it is a very good rifle and can be utilized. In order to provide rifles, with the necessary allowances for wastage, it is necessary to utilize all the rifles now in hand, so that at the present it is impossible for the Government to supply rifles to colleges or rifle clubs or to anything of that character.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I might say, however, this is not the particular target practice which the gentleman has in mind. It is another item. This provides practice with hand and rifle grenades.

The money or the small-arms practice, while carried in the same language, is something in the neighborhood of $100,000,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. This increase from $2,000,000 to $13,000,000 is very large, and I notice in lines 15 and 16 it provides for this:

And instruction at the educational institutions and State soldiers' and sailors' orphan homes—

And so forth.

Now, I have a number of inquiries from western Pennsylvania—and I presume other Congressmen are in the same fix—from home guards that are being organized to take the place of the National Guard called into the United States service. I would like to know if this provision is intended to furnish guns for such new organizations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not. This particular provision is to provide the necessary quantity of supplies to train this army in the handling of hand and rifle grenades.

Mr. ROBBINS. What does it mean, then, by "instruction at the educational institutions"? What is that to cover?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The language of the deficiency appropriation act is always in the wording of the original, or the regular, appropriation. We do not change the language, because to do so would require the opening of a new account in the department and in the Treasury Department. And while this money could be utilized for the purpose indicated, it will not be so utilized, because it is required, and imperatively required, in order to obtain the necessary munitions to train this army that is now being assembled into camps.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. We passed a law some time ago that said any college with a hundred male students could have attached to it an officer. That was what I had in mind—whether or not this fund goes to that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The probabilities are there will be very few, if any, officers available to detail to schools and colleges to train these men. Practically every officer in the Army and Navy on the retired list who is capable of rendering service has been called to active duty. The necessity for providing qualified officers for an army that will be from a million to two million men is so much more important than the detail of officers to colleges and schools that that law will have to be ignored and that work for the time neglected. Those young men will have their chance when they reach the draft age. Until then they will have to be drilled through the efforts of such persons as are qualified and who can not be utilized for military service.

Mr. FESS. My concern, I would say to the chairman, is due to a good many letters from presidents of institutions asking why they can not put that particular item of the law in force.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The reason they can not put it into effect is that the demand for officers qualified to perform services in the field exceeds the available supply. Until there is a surplus of officers it will be impossible to assign officers under the law referred to by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores and supplies: For overhauling, cleaning, repairing, and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores in the hands of troops and at the arsenals, posts, and depots; for purchase and manufacture of ordnance stores to fill requirements of troops; for Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery equipments, including horse equipments for Cavalry and Artillery, $70,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 45, line 25, strike out the sum "$70,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$73,520,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Automatic machine rifles: For the purchase, manufacture, test, repair, and maintenance of automatic machine rifles, including their mounts, sights, and equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture, $120,277,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $50,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 46, line 8, strike out the sum "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$118,020,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some explanation of that increase. Why so much of an increase, if the learned chairman will let us have some explanation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is for two purposes. In the first place, on information received from abroad, the number of automatic rifles, or machine guns, which troops are using is very greatly in excess of the number upon which the original estimate was based. Secondly, it is due to the fact that we are attempting to anticipate, by placing orders for manufacture, the automatic rifles or machine guns that may be required for troops that may be called into the service later.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 46, in line 4, strike out the sum "$120,277,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$220,277,000."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, that last raise somewhat disconcerted me for a moment, but the question I want to ask is this: I have never before seen the expression "automatic machine rifle." Is there any difference between the machine rifle and machine gun?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The terms are used somewhat interchangeably, but perhaps they are, as Gen. Crozier stated, gradually settling down to assume a distinction, and that is, the "automatic machine gun," being applied to the heavier type, and the "automatic rifle" being applied to the lighter type that the man carries himself.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then they can not make the old-fashioned machine guns or any machine guns if there is a distinction between machine guns and machine rifles? This limits them to machine rifles?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The expression covers both terms. Gen. Crozier said that in order to distinguish them, in discussing them, the military men are by degrees commencing to use them in this particular way, so as to distinguish the type of gun. But this language, "automatic machine rifle," covers both the light and the heavy types.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It occurred to me when I saw that, that if there was a distinction, they could not under this appropriation make the Lewis machine gun, which was once rejected by the War Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The "automatic machine rifle" is a technical expression that covers all guns of that type, whether they are of light or heavy type.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Lewis machine gun was once rejected by the War Department. Would they be permitted under this language to make Lewis machine guns?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. They have been buying them in immense quantities, and of different types, because it is impossible to get sufficient of one type to meet the needs of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk read as follows:

Armored motor cars: For the purchase, manufacture, test, repair, and maintenance of armored motor cars, $16,750,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $5,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 46, after line 16, insert as a new paragraph:
"The Secretary of War is authorized, during the present emergency and in addition to the appropriations and obligations specifically authorized by law, to incur obligations for ordnance and ordnance supplies and materials: Provided, That the aggregate amount of such obligations outstanding at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $100,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows.

The Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army is authorized to employ in the District of Columbia, out of the appropriations made in this act for designing, procuring, caring for, and supplying ordnance and ordnance stores to the Army, such services, other than clerical, as are necessary for carrying out these purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 46, after line 22, insert as a new paragraph the following:
"Not to exceed $11,000 of the appropriations herein or heretofore made for the Ordnance Department may be expended for rent of space in the District of Columbia for the use of the Office of the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Machinery for rifles: For the purchase or manufacture of machinery and other facilities for the manufacture of rifles, including the necessary buildings, range, and other expenses incident thereto, $9,500,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York state briefly the reason for the amendment that was adopted, providing $100,000,000 to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. Under the law the Secretary of War can not purchase or enter into obligations for ordnance or ordnance stores and supplies unless either appropriations have been made or specific authority has been given to enter into obligations. Owing to the emergent character of the present situation, immediately upon the outbreak of the war the War Department did, without any authority, contrary to the existing statutes, enter into obligations to obtain for the Government very large quantities of ordnance and munitions that were essential for the Army, and it made those acquisitions in advance of authority, because it takes so long to get these particular things that the belief was that they would be severely condemned, even by Congress, if under the existing circumstances they waited until specific authority had been granted.

In the urgent deficiency bill of June 15, all of those actions were practically ratified by providing that the moneys appropriated should be available for the obligations incurred prior to that date without authority. It developed in the course of investigation that, based upon information that now comes from abroad—but very little of which was obtained by our military experts until the United States actually became involved in the war—a necessity for all kinds of ordnance supplies of a character never used in war before is arising; that as a result of operations abroad, quantities of guns and ammunition and implements of every conceivable character are required upon a scale that nobody ever contemplated would be reached, so that when this information is received and examined by committees of the War College and by the General Staff, and a project determined upon and the Ordnance Bureau works out the estimate and it is then approved by so many different officials and transmitted to Congress and they are compelled to wait for the necessary action by Congress, in the procurement of these materials considerable time that is very essential is lost. It was ascertained that the Congress thus far has declined to honor no request that has been made by the War Department for ordnance or ordnance material. Whatever guns or ammunition or equipment the military experts determine to be necessary for our troops, Congress provides the money.

Then this difficulty has arisen, that after a project had been determined upon and in anticipation of action by Congress, attempts were made to negotiate with concerns to enlarge their facilities or convert their plants so that they might undertake the manufacture of certain things determined to be essential. It was impossible to get beyond a certain point, because an individual could have no assurance of a legal character that if he made arrangements to undertake what was desired by the Government the money would afterwards be available, and inasmuch as no authority existed to make a valid contract he would be without redress. In order to obviate these delays and make it possible for the War Department to proceed with expedition upon such matters the situation was discussed, and it was decided to recommend that authority be given to incur obligations in excess of appropriations, or specific authority to incur obligations, to the extent of $100,000,000 for ordnance and ordnance supplies and munitions, and the officials of the War Department admitted that such a provision would practically relieve the department of all the difficulties and embarrassments that were encountered in the work of preparation. The committee limited the authority to the existing emergency.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Would it be proper for the chairman of the committee to state our ability or our capacity to make such guns as are now used on the front in the heavy artillery?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would and it would not.

Mr. FESS. I do not want it unless it would be proper.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is necessary for the Government in order to obtain the ordnance required to provide for the extension of many existing plants and for the establishment of plants not now in existence, and it will tax the resources of the country to the utmost to provide the ordnance of the character required for the number of men that it is proposed to be put in the field. If our men are delayed in engaging in the operations on the other side it will be due more than anything else to the inability to obtain the ordnance required, and that was the controlling feature in having the committee recommend this provision for this authority.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I want to give the House some information upon this point that came to me, not through the hearings before the committee but entirely through my own investigations.

Ordnance supplies cover a great deal besides guns and munitions strictly so-called. There are a great many accessories to them. One of the chief is the harness and saddle and accoutrements for the Artillery. Just at the present time there is going to be an enormous demand for Field Artillery for the peculiar character of fighting in Europe. Practically all of our Cavalry is being turned into Field Artillery.

One of the greatest difficulties we find is in providing harnesses for the Field Artillery. It so develops that within the last few years the trade of harness making has been one of the dying trades. Very few young men have gone into the business of harness making. They would rather go into the garage and learn to repair automobiles; there is more chance for the acceptance of work and more chance for business. The number of harness makers has been falling off in the last decade until, as I say, it is one of the dying trades.

A large number of saddletrees and harnesses were necessary. It is almost impossible to find establishments that could either turn out the necessary amount in a reasonable time, or even promise to extend the facilities to turn them out within a reasonable time. It was necessary to induce them to increase their facilities and take a large number of employees, girls and others, and train them to machine work. They had to have a guaranty of a certain amount of business before we could get them to even start. They had to know that they could be assured of a certain amount of business to be handed over to them. That work has been going on. This part of the work is being done for the Ordnance Department in the War Department, in this particular line at least with which I am familiar, in order to stimulate the possibilities of American production.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. BARNHART. Is it not a fact that previous to the declaration of war by us most of the harness makers and saddle makers had extended contracts with the allied powers, and that as rapidly as these contracts expire they will be ready to take up the work for the United States?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no doubt that element entered into it, but there is the other element which enters into it, as I say; the harness business as a trade has rapidly decreased so that the supply of harness makers is limited—like the supply of shipbuilders. A new organization had to be created to meet the demand.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know of any reason why harness makers working for the War Department should receive less wages or compensation than those working for some other branches of the Government?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I do not know of any reason, but there may be many of which I am not aware.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know what the compensation of the harness makers is?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not; but my understanding is that the Ordnance Department has called to its aid some practical men in the harness-making business, and after careful estimates upon the necessary cost of material and labor, they have fixed a price above which they will not go. They say if the manufacturers will not accept contracts at those prices, with this authority they will create harness factories and therefore they will get the work for the Government at what they think is a fair price.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is not the harness maker to-day like other artisans? The harness maker is the man that finishes the strap in a harness factory to-day, and another harness maker makes another strap, and so on, and then they are assembled into a harness.

Mr. BORLAND. That is true; most of the trades have been subdivided so that they are doing a small division of the work.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORTIFICATIONS.

For purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture, $676,213,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $225,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 47, in line 12, strike out the sum "$676,213,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum of "$695,100,000."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I do not know as this is a subject which the gentleman will want to discuss, but I suppose the difficulty to which I am about to refer, if it ever existed, has been done away with.

Before the war began, sometime last summer, I was talking with a man who had been in one of the coast fortifications and he told me about the difficulties that we have had with gun carriages generally in being unable to elevate them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps I can answer the gentleman by saying that while this is carried under the head of fortifications it does not relate to seacoast defenses. The gentleman will recall that the fortification bill is much wider in scope than its title would indicate. This is really for field artillery, and the reason is this: The estimates, as regularly submitted to Congress, contemplated field artillery for an army of a million men. The additional estimates were made necessary because of unforeseen things that were needed for that army, increase both in caliber and in number of guns, and also for a new army of a million men, due to the fact that there is nothing that takes so long to create as heavy ordnance; and if we were to have an additional army in the field it would be necessary now to make provision for the field artillery to accompany them, otherwise they would be held back many, many months until such artillery could be supplied. So that the provisions carried in the appropriation bill that became a law June 15, taken with these amounts, are supposed to equip an army of a million men and also a reserve army of a million men, and when I say equip I mean with guns that shall accompany the army in the field and 25 per cent reserve for the bases abroad and 25 per cent reserve for the troops that are necessary to make up the wastage that would result from these troops being actually in the field. In other words, we are providing 150 per cent of artillery for the 2,000,000 men. Also it is proper to say that some of the amount was made necessary by the increased cost of manufacture now as compared with the cost at the time the figures were made by the Treat Board, that the gentleman will recall presented a report about a year ago touching the equipment of an army with heavy field guns.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I asked the question I did because the caption of this paragraph is "Fortifications."

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand, and it would naturally mislead the gentleman; but the fortification bill deals not only with seacoast defense but also with mobile artillery,

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon, including experiments in connection therewith, machinery for its manufacture, and the necessary storage facilities $663,000,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $700,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 24, strike out the sum "$700,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$777,182,750."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For alteration and maintenance of the mobile artillery, including the purchase and manufacture of machinery, tools, and materials necessary for the work and the expenses of the mechanics engaged thereon, $155,600,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $50,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 4, strike out the sum "$155,600,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sum of "$158,334,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please state why these increases are made?

Mr. SHERLEY. That particular increase was made necessary in order to provide for the alteration of certain guns that we are taking from here and sending abroad. I prefer not to go into more detail than that statement. The increase ahead of that related to ammunition for trench mortars.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, in view of these tremendously large amounts which we are appropriating, I would like to ask a question as to the price of steel, because the major portion of these appropriations no doubt is due to the cost of steel and raw material. Has any evidence been given before the committee as to the price of steel that this Government is going to pay to the Steel Trust?

Mr. SHERLEY. There was not. The matter was not gone into. It is my understanding that the question of steel prices generally is a matter now engaging the attention of the Government, and they have not yet arrived at a program fixing those prices.

Mr. SABATH. Is an effort being made to secure a reasonable price from the steel manufacturers or the Steel Trust for the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there is, and I think it is going to be a successful effort, but the details of it I do not know.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman realizes that we have been endeavoring to fix the prices of other commodities, and, in view of the tremendous profits which the steel manufacturers have been making, I was wondering whether a program is on foot to bring the steel trust and the steel manufacturers to a position whereby they will be precluded from charging the Government the prices they desire.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is my understanding that unless what the Government considers to be a fair price should be voluntarily agreed to by the steel people, the Government will exercise the power it has and control the situation.

Mr. SABATH. To commandeer the plants? I think that would be a very wise thing to do.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of submarine mines and nets and necessary appliances to operate them for closing the channels leading to our principal seaports, and for continuing torpedo experiments, $700,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, in charge of the bill, whether he does not think, in view of the fact that we can not finish the bill tonight, that it is time to rise?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5949, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. BLAND to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the following cases, no adverse reports having been made thereon:

Edward L. Dodd, Sixty-second Congress;
John Mallet, Sixty-fourth Congress;
Virgil O. Adams, Sixty-third Congress;
John P. Kennan, Sixty-fourth Congress; and Thos. E. Whisenand, Sixty-fourth Congress.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 18, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting tentative draft of a proposed amendment to the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 368; to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting findings of fact, conclusions of law, and opinion of the court in the case of State of Massachusetts v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 369); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Texas: A bill (H. R. 6106) establishing a marketing system for the purpose of facilitating the distribution of farm products and the promoting of the economic distribution and sale of the same; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 6107) to regulate the interstate use of automobiles and all self-propelled vehicles which use the public highways in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 6108) to increase the amount of the clothing allowance in the case of enlisted men of the Navy on first enlistment; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. GRAY of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 6109) providing certain regulations in respect to the circulation through the United States mails and otherwise of newspapers, magazines, periodicals, and other printed matter published in the language of any country with which the United States is now or may hereafter be at war, or any ally of such country; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. McLEMORE: Resolution (H. Res. 142) proposing that each State train its own negro soldiers and in separate camps from the white soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Resolution (H. Res. 143) providing that no public building shall be erected except as a war emergency and upon the approval of the Fine Arts Commission; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) authorizing the erection of a memorial in Washington to the memory and in honor of the members of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War; to the Committee on the Library.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII,

Mr. HOUSTON submitted a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 22) authorizing the printing of the report of the Alaskan Engineering Commission for the year ended December 31, 1916, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII,

Mr. LONERGAN submitted a petition of the Hartford Division, Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees of America, asking for a Federal investigation of the explosion during the preparedness parade in San Francisco July 22, 1916, which was referred to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 18, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the splendid unity that characterizes our national life. In the time that is testing all things we gain inspiration and certainty as we go forward out of the unity of counsel and purpose and ideals that animate a great people. We pray Thee to draw us nearer to Thyself that we may see clearly before us the path in which the Divine Providence would lead us. We pray that Thou wilt give us great success in all our enterprises. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore [Senator WILLARD SAULSBURY] assumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of both Saturday and Sunday will be dispensed with. The Chair hears none, and the Journals will stand approved.

STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 369).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion of law filed by the court in the case of the State of Massachusetts v. The United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT (S. DOC. NO. 88).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War submitting additional estimates of deficiencies in appropriations amounting to $287,416,000 required for the service of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, which was ordered to be printed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	Martin	Shafroth
Beckham	Hale	New	Sheppard
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Page	Sterling
Cummins	Kendrick	Phelan	Swanson
Curtis	Kenyon	Pomerene	Underwood
Dillingham	Kirby	Reed	Vardaman
Fletcher	McNary	Saulsbury	Williams

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is unavoidably absent on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

I wish also to announce the absence of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-six Senators have answered to their names. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HARDING, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. RANDELL, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. STONE, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. HUSTING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GORF], is unavoidably absent owing to illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KING and Mr. SMITH of Arizona entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. BRADY, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. WATSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the order just made be vacated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order will be vacated.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 2888) granting a pension to Arch Linthicum; and

A bill (S. 2889) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Cheuvront; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 2890) to provide quarters or commutation therefor to commissioned officers of the Army who have dependents to support; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PAGE:

A bill (S. 2891) granting a pension to Mary Jedowin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 2892) granting a pension to Mary Snow; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $103,000 for the acquisition of additional land in Groton, Conn., for the New London submarine base, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. REED submitted an amendment providing that land-grant railroads organized under the act of July 29, 1866, chapter 300, shall receive the same compensation for transportation of property and troops of the United States as is paid to land-grant railroads organized under the land-grant act of March 3, 1863, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE BIRTH OF AMERICAN THRIFT.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have here a pamphlet entitled "The Birth of American Thrift," by John Muir. The pamphlet is evidently suggested by the sale of liberty bonds. Emphasis is placed upon the sale under the partial-payment plan, and it is particularly suggestive as to the sale of bonds to workmen. Tables are given showing subscriptions by workmen to the liberty bonds. I think it may be of such importance in regard to the sale of future issues of bonds that it ought to be printed as a public document, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that this pamphlet be referred to the Committee on Printing for report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, in order to enable committees to devote their time continuously to a number of very important matters that are under consideration I think time will be saved by an adjournment of the Senate. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock Thursday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, September 20, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 18, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for every fraud unearthed, for every injustice brought to light, for every act of dishonesty and perfidy uncovered throughout the world, and we most fervently pray that speedy retribution may follow the wrongdoer, both for his sake and for the sake of humanity. But we rejoice with exceeding great joy that for every fraud there are a thousand genuine acts, for every injustice a thousand deeds of justice and kindness, for every deed of dishonesty a thousand acts of honesty; that there is more good in the world than evil, in spite of the terrible conditions which confront us; that the trend of civilization is upward not downward, forward not backward; that God reigns and the star of love is in the ascendancy; that the ties of brotherhood are strengthening and widening day by day; and with an optimism born of faith in Thee and in humanity we look forward with confidence in the coming of Thy kingdom in all its sweetness and fullness and the reign of Thy love in every heart; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DALE of New York, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRUCKNER, indefinitely, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some further observations upon the rehabilitation and reeducation of the wounded soldier.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by adding some further literature on the subject of the rehabilitation of the wounded soldier. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech on "Why we are at war," by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] on "Why we are at war." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5949, the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5949, the urgent deficiency bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchasing and supplying uniforms to park, monument, and bridge watchmen, $950.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to the item "For purchasing and supplying uniforms to park, monument, and bridge watchmen, $950." My recollection is that is an item which has been in the bill for a good many years, has it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is for the purchase of uniforms for these men.

Mr. BORLAND. It has been the custom for us to purchase uniforms for them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They get $70 a month, and it was because of the low compensation they received that we believed it proper to purchase their uniforms.

Mr. BORLAND. That was my recollection, and I also recall that there was a proposition made and urged upon the committee at different times to supply this increasing army of chauffeurs around here uniforms and gloves and all sorts of their accouterments. Nothing has been done about that, has there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not so far as I have any knowledge.

Mr. BORLAND. It does seem we ought not to buy gloves and these other accouterments for the chauffeurs, who are increasing very rapidly in number and most of whom are very well paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, most men who can afford a chauffeur buy the necessary accouterments to make them presentable and attractive looking.

Mr. BORLAND. They ought to; but it is an item which, I take it, could very easily grow into considerable proportions.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a temporary office building, including heating and lighting, for the use of the War and Navy Departments, to contain approximately 1,055,000 square feet, to be erected in Henry Park, reservation No. 4, Sixth and B Streets, $2,000,000. Space in said building shall be allotted by the officer in charge of Public Buildings and Grounds upon the joint order of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, lines 16 to 23, inclusive, page 49. Will the gentleman from New York, in charge of the bill, consent that that shall go over until later? I will explain, Mr. Chairman, the reason why I make that request. The other day when the attention of the committee was directed to this proposed new building by the chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I congratulated him and the committee on their having decided to erect one Government building; rather than to rent a number of smaller buildings to be erected by private persons and located here and there, without regard to the plan for the improvement of the city and without provision against its disfigurement. It is a fact that many such structures have been put up within the last three or four years that for generations to come will disfigure the appearance of the National Capital.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I was just going to say to the gentleman the character of this building is such as to make it certain that it would not remain there more than a very few years.

Mr. MADDEN. And it is right back of the market, anyway.

Mr. SHERLEY. And it is away from any place where it could be considered objectionable because of its locality.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, instead of that being an out-of-the-way place, it is, in my judgment, with all respect to the gentlemen who differ from me, a very prominent place.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, it is prominent in the sense it is within the Mall. It is not on the Avenue, and it is not contemplated that the building should be there permanently. I will say to the gentleman that this was done not with the idea of having something there forever, but as the result of a very elaborate effort on the part of not only the Committee on Appropriations, but the commission that was appointed in the last Congress, composed of Members of the House and Senate, the Acting Supervising Architect, Col. Harts, and the Superintendent of the Capitol, and it presented the most feasible, simple, and practical plan that we could work out to take care of this very pressing need of the departments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I always have great respect for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and for his opinions in discussions on this floor. There is no Member for whose judgment I have more regard. But in looking at this I will say, by way of introduction—

Mr. SHERLEY. I was just going to suggest to the gentleman that I would trade the compliment for the "but." [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. While I respect the gentleman and his judgment, I do not agree with him at this particular time. The other day when I congratulated the committee that they had decided to build one building rather than to lease several, I had not then read this paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I stated what it would be.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know the gentleman stated it, but I did not get that clear comprehension which I now have. I can not understand how a "temporary" office building, as we ordinarily understand the word "temporary," is going to cost $2,000,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will tell you how the gentleman can understand it, if he will permit.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Just a minute. Two millions of dollars, with the number of square feet that are to be provided for, indicates absolutely within narrow limits what the character of the material must be to carry out that provision.

Mr. MADDEN. How many cubic feet?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One million fifty-five thousand square feet.

Now, I am not a contractor, but I know enough to know that when a contractor is required for $2,000,000 to put up a building containing so many square feet he is limited in his choice of material.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I think about the average cost of a well-constructed building would be $5 per square foot. Of course the construction cost per cubic foot is a totally different proposition. So it must be evident that if this building is going to cost only $2,000,000, and it has more than 1,000,000 square feet, it is not a very highly constructed building.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is to cost $2,000,000, a very considerable outlay. I understand that the new building in which the Interior Department is located cost about $2,000,000, and that is a permanent structure. I do not know how many square feet it contains, but there are a good many.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can give the gentleman the information. It has 781,000 square feet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are 14½ acres of floor space in the Interior Department Building.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has 781,000 square feet.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It has 781,000 square feet. Is it square feet or is it cubic feet?

Mr. STAFFORD. Square feet. It has 781,000 square feet of all available space from the cellar to the top floor.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is three-fourths as many square feet as this proposed building is to contain. And that building of the Interior Department cost $2,000,000, or a little short of it. It is evident to me that this building, which it is proposed to put up in the Mall for $2,000,000, is to be a substantial structure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows that if the Interior Department Building was erected to-day instead of the time it was contracted for it could not be built at double that price. Labor and materials have increased in some cases over 100 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They entered it only two months ago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was started three or four years ago. The contracts were made three or four years ago, before any of this excessive cost for labor and material.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the answer to his speculation is found in the fact, and the fact is, that they are going to build a temporary frame structure there, and they could not build a structure with that many square feet for the price indicated with the present cost of labor and material that was anything but a temporary structure. You could not touch it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is a very important suggestion. But in connection with the Interior Department Building I am reminded that the very persons who probably will draw the plans for this building are those who made the original plans providing that red brick should be used for the new Interior Department Building, and it was only because the Arts Commission insisted that a great structure of red brick in that location would permanently disfigure that part of Washington that finally it was agreed to use stone for the exterior. But if the newspapers are to be relied upon it took a long and persistent campaign to effect this very important and necessary change.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply desire to say again that the fact is that the building that will be put up there will be a frame building, will be white, and be made to be as pleasant to the eye as a temporary building of that character can be made.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Two millions of dollars will build considerable of a frame building.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and this is to be considerable of a building. Now, there is no need of our speculating on the floor about it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is to be only one-quarter larger than the Interior Department Building.

Mr. SHERLEY. We had the best advice of the men who ought to know, and among them was Col. Harts, who is secretary of the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This building is to go up in the Mall. I remember the struggle that took place not many years ago about the proposed location of a certain other structure in the Mall on this very site. The gentleman from Kentucky will remember that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. had had its station there for many years. They were forced out only a few years ago when the Union Station was provided for. But at the time to which I referred, a bill was introduced in the House which not only permitted that railroad company to retain the land they were then using for a station and tracks, but gave them also 14 additional acres in that Mall, clear across it. They were to use it for car trackage, for anything of the sort they wanted, and for a new station, so that forever between the National Capital and the monument to George Washington there would be a great roach-back station and tracks crowded with smoking locomotives. The park, a very large section of it, would have been destroyed for park purposes, and an irreparable wrong done to the people of this city and to all of the people of the United States. For this is the Capital City of all of the people. And yet that bill went through the House and became a law, and we never could get it changed until the President of the United States, at the request of Daniel Burnham, then at the head of the Arts Commission, sent for Mr. Cassatt, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and after a consultation in which those three distinguished men took part, the company finally agreed to help build the present Union Station on the site it occupies and which was fixed for it in the commission's plan for the improvement of the city. This plan, the commission said, and the President agreed, was necessary and ought to be carried out. And yet the Government had to contribute about $4,000,000 before it could get the railroad company out of the Mall. I will never forget my surprise when the proposition was brought in here permanently to locate that station there and to give that company 14 additional acres of land in that beautiful park.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think the gentleman should take the time of the committee in rehearsing ancient history that has no relation to this matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It has this relation to it—

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has none whatever.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. The gentleman is talking about something that happened in the early days of my service in the House, for which I was not responsible and which I voted against. If the gentleman wants information about this building, very well.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This proposed building, to cost $2,000,000, is to go up on the same site—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, if the gentleman wants information about it, I will be pleased to give it to him. If he is just speculating about things that might happen, I can not furnish him with information. I will make a statement about the matter, and if he does not want to consider it at this time he can exercise his rights and have it go out of the bill. I want the bill completed sometime, and before it is completed I want to point out—

Mr. FESS. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if the Washington Memorial Association has not an option on that ground upon which to erect a convention hall?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. I also recall, Mr. Chairman, that the Washington Memorial Society, organized to erect a memorial to George Washington, was by an act of Congress given permission to put up a building on that exact site.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And I understand they have raised between $500,000 and $600,000 for that purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The Congress has extended the time on several occasions in which that building could be constructed, and I was instrumental in the last Congress in having that original authority modified so as to require a smaller initial sum to be fixed in order to construct the building. They are not in a position to construct the building at this time, and even if they were, they are not able to do it because of the existing prices.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will not this paragraph, if it becomes a law, amount, in effect, to a repeal of the law granting them the use of that land?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will defer the use of this particular property for that purpose probably for five years, or during the continuation of this war. I have been a Member of this House 19 years, and the gentleman longer than that, and I think when I first came here the proposition about that memorial hall was under discussion, and the necessities of the Government at this time justified deferring a few years longer such a memorial. I will be pleased to give the gentleman information about the matter if he desires.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The society, if newspaper reports are to be relied upon, has already in hand about half a million dollars or a little more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that, but—

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The plans for the Washington Memorial Building—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman reserve a point of order?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; the gentleman reserves a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. When a point of order is reserved, under the rules of the House the gentleman reserving it is entitled under the five-minute rule to five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee has before it requests for space from the various services of the Government intimately connected with the conduct of the war aggregating $15,000 square feet. The annual expenditure for rent in the propositions submitted to the committee amounted to $427,800. It was proposed to repair one building at an expense of $15,000 and to erect a small temporary structure at a cost of $300,000. Four hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars, according to the calculation of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which he emphasized yesterday when there was a provision to lease a building at $48,000 a year, is the annual interest on $10,720,000 at 4 per cent.

An examination of the proposals submitted by the representatives of the Government disclosed the fact that with one exception it was necessary in order to obtain the accommodations to enter into five-year leases. The one exception is the Arlington Hotel site property. The owners of that building are willing to rent from year to year at an annual rental of $210,000, which is 4 per cent, if I figure correctly, upon an investment of $5,000,000. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will listen to what I am saying.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not until I finish the statement. The Arlington Hotel site property is offered and is to be taken by the Government at an annual rental of $210,000, which is equivalent to a 4 per cent return upon an investment of $5,000,000. One of the propositions submitted provided for a five-year rental of a building to be erected adjoining the present Interstate Commerce Building. A proposal is submitted by the same persons who erected the Interstate Commerce Building. It was based upon a five-year lease proposal. The promoters of that project have hunted every financial center in the United States, and it is impossible for them to obtain the money to finance that operation unless the Government is willing to enter into a 10-year lease.

It appeared upon investigation that buildings erected at this time will cost approximately from 33 to 100 per cent in excess of what they would cost in normal times; that those approached to finance such a building insist that such provision be made for rental to the Government that the estimated shrinkage in value that will result when the war ends, of probably 33 per cent, must be amortized in the rent to be paid by the Government in the initial lease.

It also is apparent from knowledge obtained in the preparation of this bill that the probabilities are that within a year it will be necessary to provide accommodations of approximately a million square feet additional for the service of the Government. The Bureau of Ordnance alone is obtaining in this bill appropriations of two billions and a half, and they have already had more than a billion dollars. The munitions department of the British Government, which had to be organized since the war originated, and which now, because of the effectiveness of its organization, is making possible the present success of the allies, has more than 8,000 employees in the city of London alone. It is necessary for the proper conduct and prosecution of this war to organize the bureaus and departments upon a scale never contemplated and commensurate with the amount of work undertaken.

What was the committee to do? Let the Government be at the mercy of real estate promoters that have been denounced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] every time a proposition is made here to rent or endeavor to do something that will expedite and promote and provide facilities for the Government.

There are not in existence in Washington office facilities for employees who must be obtained if the war is properly conducted. Facilities must be provided. Should they be provided by private enterprise and the Government amortize the excessive costs in rental, or should we provide some sensible scheme for the emergency and assume whatever risk may be the result of it?

Four hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars on the basis of a five-year lease amounts to two million one hundred and odd thousand dollars in rental alone. It would result in the various services of the Government being scattered in all sorts of indefinite and unsuitable places. The Bureau of Ordnance to-day that ought to have all its force in one building and under one roof is scattered in seven different buildings in Washington. Loss in efficiency and effectiveness can not be measured in money. The most important thing is to have an effective organization, and so as a member of the commission provided by Congress to provide for the permanent housing of the departments of the Government, I had the commission called together. It consists of three members of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, three members of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, three members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House—myself, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET]—three members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], and I do not recall the name of the other member, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, Col. Harts, who is a member of the Commission of Fine Arts, and the Superintendent of the Capitol, Mr. Woods.

That commission met, took the requests submitted to Congress, and directed the three technical members of the commission to prepare estimates for a building, to contain approximately a million square feet of space, and to investigate and report upon an available site for such a building in the city. After two weeks spent in repeated meetings, repeated discussions and consideration, that commission unanimously agreed upon this proposition; 15 members of the commission unanimously agreed upon this proposition as imperatively needed for the service of the Government.

Upon the adoption of a resolution by the commission, which was transmitted to the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Appropriations submitted this recommendation to the House.

This is not to be a permanent building. A permanent building could not be erected within the amount provided. This building will be of a temporary character, equipped with a sprinkler system, and, as the bill provides, must be provided with heat and light. The heating of the building alone will be considerable because of the temporary character and extensive area that will be covered.

If this building is authorized, within 60 days parts of it will be available for the Government to utilize, and it is expected to be completed within 90 days. We can not wait 10 or 12 months for this space. The operations of the Government are now being delayed because there is no place to put employees who must be had in order to expend this money. It is idle for Congress to make these appropriations, it is a waste of time, unless we provide the places for the employees to carry on the work.

I know, because these things come to me, everybody who hopes to get a contract to put up buildings to be occupied by the Government looks with grave alarm at this proposed temporary building. It is the first move to kill the golden calf. It is the first sensible scheme to let the Government get the benefit of building operations and not to enrich a coterie of men who feed on the needs of the Government. But just as soon as a proposition like this is presented under the circumstances I have stated, the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has been continually clamoring and denouncing the transactions with real estate operators, stands up and leads the opposition and is the chief objector to it.

The other day the Washington Post had a news item, as follows:

OFFICE BUILDING IN MALL OPPOSED—MEMBERS OF FINE ARTS COMMISSION BROUGHT UP OVER PLAN.

Representative FITZGERALD, chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, has stirred the wrath of the members of the Fine Arts Commission by sponsoring an appropriation for the erection of a huge frame building in the Mall to provide offices for expanding Government departments.

The bill, as framed by Mr. FITZGERALD, requires that the nondescript building be erected on a certain site not far from the National Museum, where it will loom up to break the vista from the Capitol to the Virginia shore, for which the Fine Arts Commission has made a long and persistent fight. It is held that the mushroom structure will be a glaring anomaly within the shadow of the Washington Monument, and members of the commission fear that once it is built it will not be removed for years to come.

I suspected the origin of that when I first read it, because I know the financial interests that do not wish this building erected. My impression was confirmed when the same morning that this article appeared in the Washington Post—yesterday—Col. Harts, the secretary of the Fine Arts Commission, handed me the following letter:

THE COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS,
Washington, D. C., September 17, 1917.

HON. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives, United States.

MY DEAR SIR: I desire to say to you that the inclosed newspaper statement has no basis in fact. The members of the Commission of Fine Arts know that you were one of the most efficient supporters of the McCall bill creating the Commission of Fine Arts, and that you have consistently supported the principles of the commission, although not always agreeing with its conclusions. They have the highest respect for you personally and appreciate your repeated and consistent efforts for the development of Washington.

The members of the commission realize the war needs of the Government and desire to do everything in their power to assist in the exacting work now in progress. They have ever exerted themselves to further and never to retard such work. Furthermore, they see in this emergency work opportunities to advance the general plan for Washington, and their only concern is to conserve all efforts to that end without in any measure delaying its accomplishment.

Respectfully,

CHARLES MOORE, Chairman.

The Fine Arts Commission is not at the bottom of this opposition, and I repeat that I know the general source of the opposition because I know how I have been pestered and urged and pleaded with to help authorize contracts for leases of property to be erected by private individuals. What are we to do? This lot has been set aside by act of Congress for the erection of the George Washington Memorial Hall, set aside upon condition that there shall be raised before anything is done $1,000,000 by the association to construct a building to cost $2,000,000. That act was passed on the 4th of March, 1913. Nothing has been done toward commencing the building, and in the sundry civil appropriation bill enacted at the last session of Congress, upon the representation of those interested in the proposed memorial, Congress modified the act so as to permit work to be begun when $500,000 had been raised, and extended the time within which to commence the building.

This was the one site upon which it was possible to get an agreement among men who had spent considerable time in investigating the available sites. It was believed that in view of the war needs of the Government it would not be at all out of place to defer the erection of that particular memorial until at least the war is ended. That conviction was strengthened by the fact that no one would undertake the construction of a memorial such as is proposed when the market for materials and labor is the highest in our history and the shortage of materials is seriously affecting the Government. This is a time when all private desires, all private inclinations, the wishes of all individuals, must be subordinated to the imperative needs of the Government. This provision has been put here after the most mature consideration and careful investigation. It is essential to provide these facilities if the work of the Government is to be done. For that reason I purpose, if this provision goes out on a point of order, to ask the Committee on Rules for a rule to make it in order upon this bill. I am determined to do everything in my power to give this House an opportunity to determine for itself whether the Government shall be held up by any coterie of private interests seeking to profit out of its necessities at a time like the present. I shall not propose any amendments providing for rent aggregating nearly half a million dollars, with a knowledge that similar requests must be met in a very short time, with a knowledge that the facilities that would be provided by such rental items could not be furnished inside of from 9 to 18 months, when within 90 days or 100 days at the outside we may have a building in which we could put all of these services of the Government, by means of which we could increase the efficiency of the services to an extent that can not be measured in money, by means of which we can promote the tremendous work the Government is now engaged in. I shall now be very glad to answer any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if this floor space includes all the additional space that the War and Navy Departments will probably need during the next year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all. It is a little in excess now of the apparent needs. My own opinion is that the probabilities are that within a year, if this war does not cease, the Government will require a million square feet additional.

Mr. DALLINGER. May I ask the chairman of the committee if it is still proposed or if it is probable that they will take the Arlington site when the building is completed and lease that also?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They will not unless Congress votes the money to rent it, and there is no proposal in this bill to do that.

Mr. DALLINGER. As I understand it, the proposition is to put up this temporary building and make it appear something like the World's Fair buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not exactly.

Mr. DALLINGER. I mean so that it will not be obnoxious to the eye.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A building has been designed or proposed with a main structure 50 feet wide, with a 10-foot hall and rooms 20 feet wide, and running out from it at every 20 or 30 feet wings, so that it will afford the greatest amount of light within the space provided. It is to be a three-story building, without elevators, equipped with a sprinkler system; and the opinion of the three technical members of the commission is to the effect that such a building would afford adequate protection against fire risk. It is in a section of the city where I have no hesitancy in stating that the average visitor to Washington would never know it existed, because unless he goes out of his way to go through the Mall he will not see it. It will be barely visible from Pennsylvania Avenue, and will not be offensive to the esthetic sense of the particular visitor. More than that, it is in a place where there are ample transportation facilities, and that is an important matter, because it is not possible to provide for accommodations of this character and require a very large number of employees to walk from a quarter to a half mile to cars. So we considered all the various places proposed, and this was the one that met the universal approbation of the men who were charged especially with the duty of investigating.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Solely for information, because the gentleman knows more about it than anybody else. What greater percentage does it take to put up a permanent building of a given size than a temporary building?

Mr. MADDEN. Let me give the Speaker some information on that from my practical knowledge of the situation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. If you put up a reasonable, decently constructed building in normal times it would cost $5 a square foot, and maybe $8, depending upon the character of the construction. It would cost anywhere from 35 to 50 cents a cubic foot. Under the present circumstances it costs $9 a square foot to put up a reasonably decently constructed building.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much would it cost for a temporary building?

Mr. MADDEN. This is going to cost less than $2 a square foot, so anybody can see it is only a temporary building.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much longer will it take to put up a permanent building of a given kind than a temporary building?

Mr. MADDEN. It would take about a year and a half to two years to put up a well-constructed, permanent building, and this can be put up anywhere from 60 to 90 days.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Ninety days.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question that has got nothing to do with this bill. I have asked the gentleman from New York two or three times in days gone by, What is the reason the Government does not build all its buildings and quit renting from Tom, Dick, and Harry?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Congress at the last session created, in the sundry civil act, a commission on the permanent housing of Government activities. One consideration in the selection of this site was that if this were not selected another site would have to be selected which has already been set aside for a permanent building. Some members of the commission were reluctant to put up a temporary structure there lest it might delay the beginning of the work of permanently housing Government activities.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, that building that is going to be put up here by the theater—

Mr. FITZGERALD. On what is known as the Belasco lot?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is going to be a permanent building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a permanent building for the needs of the Treasury Department and so conveniently located that it is proposed to connect it by a tunnel with the Treasury Department and practically be an annex to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it going to be a modern office building or one of these monumental concerns?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The proposition is to put up a modern office building, with the front so designed as to harmonize with the structures around the building.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. DYER. Does the Government still own the old Census Office Building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Government never owned the Census Building. It is owned by an estate. It is now occupied partially by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Last year Congress authorized a remodeling and reconstructing of the courthouse, which is an historic building and which also provides accommodations for the courts during the time that work is under way. Sufficient accommodations were rented in the old Census Building to enable the courts to continue their business. I think there are five parts of the District Supreme Court with the necessary attendants and employees occupying practically a third to one-half of the old Census Building.

Mr. DYER. Will the Government use the balance of that building for its activities?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can not be used very well, I am informed, because of the way in which it has been necessary to divide it up for the courts. If that building had not been utilized in that way, it would have been a very desirable building and the rental of it would have been very low.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. For five minutes?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, and perhaps another five minutes, although I do not know that I shall wish it all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has made a speech which, when read in the RECORD by one not familiar with the proceedings on the floor, would lead the most honest reader to believe that, in making this point of order, I had been influenced by real-estate interests in the city of Washington. The gentleman from New York knew better when he made the insinuation—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the gentleman might be the innocent tool of those people. I have seen that happen in Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Innocent tool! Mr. Chairman, upon my honor as a Representative, I declare now that absolutely no person has either directly or indirectly said a word to me on the subject of this proposed building, nor in my presence said anything to any other person on the subject, nor in any manner, at any time, directly or indirectly, communicated with me concerning it. My reservation of the point of order is strictly in accordance with what always has been my openly declared attitude on this general subject. This attitude was made plain when the other day I congratulated the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the Committee on Appropriations had decided to recommend that the Government itself erect one building rather than pay rent for a number of buildings privately owned all over the city. That was not the first time I had expressed a similar view on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, no person knows that fact better than does the gentleman from New York, but he knows also that outside of the city of Washington are readers of the RECORD who do not know it. No man knows better than does the gentleman from New York that in previous Congresses I have been as vigorous as my humble abilities would permit me to be in opposing the indiscriminate renting, by the Government, of privately owned buildings in the city of Washington. I have done this Congress after Congress, but I have never heard the gentleman from New York say a word about it until to-day.

In the RECORD, page 7277, first session, Sixty-fourth Congress, is the report of a speech during which, in support of my views, I read from an article in the Evening Star, of this city, as follows:

Let us see what happens in these cases. The Bieber Building and the Navy Building are two of the more recent buildings erected in this manner. The financial process is simple. Preliminary estimates prepared by real estate interests lead the Government to believe that the building is to cost a certain sum of money. The rental is then fixed at 10 per cent of the supposed cost. In the case of the two buildings above cited the buildings were sold after completion at a price equal to ten times the rental paid by the Government, and the buildings are currently reported to have taken a cash profit of $100,000 in each case. Thus the Government actually pays about 15 per cent per annum on the cost of the investment for rental alone, since the leases provide that heat, light, janitor, and elevator service are provided by the Government. What really happens is that the leases are capitalized at 10 per cent and sold, the building being thrown in.

No more ruinous policy could possibly be pursued. Strong efforts in Washington are now centered upon preventing the erection by the Government of any new buildings. Real estate owners know that they never could rent the buildings now occupied by the Government if they are vacated by the Government.

After thus reading from the article in the Star, I took occasion in my own language to approve the writer's protest against this practice of mulcting the Government. Referring to a proposed renting of certain buildings not then constructed, I said (RECORD, p. 7277):

They will doubtless be located without regard to the general plan for the development and beautification of Washington. This haphazard locating of these boxlike, ungainly structures will surely result—has in some places already resulted—in the gross architectural disfigurement of this great Capital City. Unless stopped this practice will mean the ruin of the city's beauty. The people of the United States want the Capital of the Nation to be in all respects a model municipality. It is their Capital City.

Every public building in the city of Washington ought to be located in accordance with the general plan for the harmonious development of the city.

In speaking of buildings being erected to rent to the Government, I said:

It is altogether wrong for us to permit the promiscuous construction at random here and there in the Capital City of the Nation of buildings of the type going up and rented to the Government. I do not know why these things are perpetually and insistently being done, unless, as the writer of that article declares, there are interests in the city determined to see to it that no more Government buildings shall be erected in Washington. Unless this be true, why is it that these magnificent sites on Fifteenth Street fronting that park, easily accessible from every part of the city to every resident of the city and to every visitor who comes here, are not utilized?

I pause to say that the Government has owned that very fine site from Pennsylvania Avenue down to the Mall, along Fifteenth Street, ever since 1906—11 years—but the real estate interests in Washington in some way have prevented the location of a building on that land now occupied by those old rookeries. During the same debate in May, 1916, I called attention to this fact, and to the fact that the land was bought for the express and only purpose of using it as a site for Government buildings.

What I said in that debate and in other debates on this general subject shows forcefully how unjust the gentleman from New York was in referring to me in such a way as to convey to the casual reader the impression that I, in raising this point of order at this time, sir, had been influenced by real estate interests.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I can not yield right now.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I wish the gentleman would.

May I say to the gentleman that I think he is building up a man of straw. Nobody in this House who listened to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, and nobody who knows the gentleman from Wisconsin, construed the remarks of the gentleman from New York in any sense as the gentleman from Wisconsin interprets them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for his very kind suggestion. But I expressly said that I rose at this time primarily because people outside of the Chamber who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but do not know the "gentleman from Wisconsin," could put but one interpretation upon the remarks of the gentleman from New York. He made them with an accent and a vigor that those who know the gentleman as I do understand how to interpret.

Then I said, in speaking of those squares of land:

Why is it that we let them stand idle, occupied by a few poor, cheap buildings, while we give to private people the right to erect in their discretion anywhere in this magnificent Capital City these disfiguring buildings and have our promise that they shall be leased to the Government of the United States? We already pay between six and seven hundred thousand dollars for rent here, and I repeat what I have said at other times, that it is our duty as legislators to put a stop to this practice of having the Government contract with private parties to erect buildings for it to lease and occupy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The RECORDS show that in May, 1916, I was only reiterating in effect what I had said on this floor in previous Congresses.

The statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] conveyed a false impression. I will not violate the proprieties of this place by saying that it was deliberately so intended. For years I have protested against the continued leasing of private buildings by the Government—never successfully, it is true, but doing what I could to direct the attention of the House and the country to the abuse which so long has obtained here. Therefore, the other day when it was announced that, although the Committee on Appropriations had been importuned to recommend the leasing by the Government of more privately owned buildings, it had at last brought in a bill providing that the Government itself erect its own building, I congratulated the gentleman from New York. And I should have done nothing except congratulate him had I not later ascertained that the proposed building is to be located in the Mall and to cost $2,000,000. It did not occur to me, not being an expert in the erection of great buildings, that a $2,000,000 building would in any sense of the word be temporary. I thought also that unless care were taken in advance as to the location, the character, and the height of the building, possibly a great, red-brick structure would be put into that portion of the park and stand for long years a disfiguring object between the Washington Monument and the Capitol. I felt it a part of my duty to see that the disfigurement did not take place with my vote; that is all.

But the expert builder, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], says that they can construct a building three stories high—and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has just informed the House that it is to be a frame building only three stories high—in 90 days. That is the first time during this debate that this has been said. All this important information has been elicited since I entered my notice of a reservation of a point of order.

The Members of the House ought to be thankful that at last they have some rational ground upon which to permit the putting up of a $2,000,000 building between here and the Washington Monument. If that is to be put up in 90 days as a war necessity, if it is to be of frame, if it is to be only three stories high, and temporary, I shall not object. And yet a large frame building on that location in Washington will look very greatly out of place. We all wish the Government service to be properly housed. But it is the duty of Congress always to be on guard against any possible disfigurement of the Capital City of the Nation.

Mr. DYER and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. These gentlemen want to talk to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order. I want to find out whether the item will remain in the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to make a statement. I am a member of the commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withhold it for that purpose.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment, Mr. Chairman. On the statement of the gentleman from New York and somebody else that this is to be a three-story structure and frame, to be put up in 90 days, although it is to cost $2,000,000, it will be of a temporary character, and upon the statements that have been made here I will not care to press the point of order. I reserved the point of order simply because in my inexperience I did not know that a temporary building would be put up to cost $2,000,000. It is a most extraordinary statement, but it would cost $9,000,000, according to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], if it were a permanent structure.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] misunderstood me. I did not intend to attribute to him the rôle of acting in behalf of real estate interests. In view of the statement in the Washington Post, however, I saw how easy it would be for men to be misled into doing something that would very seriously militate against the Government's needs at this time through suggestions that might be of a proper character. I knew the influences that were at work against this building. If, from a reading of what I said, as the gentleman from Wisconsin believed, it would be understood that I imputed anything to him in the way of an improper motive, I wish to have the RECORD show that I did not intend to do so. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the last Congress created a Commission on Public Buildings and Grounds, composed of three members of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, three members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, three members of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and of the House, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, the Superintendent of the Capitol, Mr. Elliott Woods, and Col. Harts, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds.

Now, I happen to be a member of that commission. We had three meetings on this proposition, ordered a thorough investigation made as to available sites in this city on Government reservations, the White House lot, the lot opposite the Treasury, and the New Willard Hotel, and a number of other locations, and we came to a unanimous agreement that the most suitable place for a temporary building was the lot formerly occupied by the Pennsylvania Depot, on Sixth Street. It was more convenient for the various activities to be housed in the proposed building than any other point except that opposite the Treasury Department, where we would practically disfigure the Treasury Department and Pennsylvania Avenue locations, although it would be more accessible to the clerks who would be housed in the building. We also considered the emergency of the various departments and their immediate requirements and the available space for the necessary forces incident to carrying on the war. A permanent and a temporary structure were considered, and the time it would take to complete them, and the cost, and the final result was that the commission, by a unanimous vote, decided that the proposition carried in the pending bill was the most suitable and favorable for the Government needs. I am pleased to know the gentleman from Wisconsin has withdrawn his point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am sure that this discussion has been of benefit to us all. I think there is no one perhaps who, without knowledge, would not have been surprised, as the gentleman from Wisconsin was surprised, that $2,000,000 should be appropriated for building a temporary structure. However, we now know that the immense size of this building will be such as to justify this tremendous expenditure. Of course, we know also that the salvage on a wooden building of this kind will be very large if it shall only be used for a short time. And when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] informs us that this same building would cost $9,000,000 if of a permanent nature, and could not be built, as we know, for two or three years, then it seems to me all objections ought to give way because it will be of immense advantage to the Government that we have consolidated as much as possible the activities we are creating to meet the demands of this war emergency. I certainly hope there will be no objection raised on the part of the committee to the expenditure of the item contained in the bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That none of the trees now growing inside the park shall be cut down or removed in the erection of said building."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered is for the purpose of directing the attention of the committee to the fact that this park is now occupied for about half its space by tennis courts and the other half by a growth of trees—very beautiful elms—that have been growing there for 50 years, planted by those who wished to beautify Washington. This is to be only a temporary building, and there is no use in removing these trees when the ground is to be used ultimately as a permanent memorial for George Washington.

The part that is cleared is probably 300 feet wide by 1,000 feet long, which is ample room on which to erect a three-story temporary building such as is contemplated here. I have offered this amendment for the purpose of directing the committee's attention to this fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. If there should be one single tree in the space where this building is to be placed we could not erect it. We had better not authorize the building. No one will unnecessarily destroy the trees. This building is to be under the control—or the construction of it—of the engineer officer who is the secretary of the Fine Arts Commission. The Fine Arts Commission is more interested in preserving the Mall than anyone else, and it is quite likely that in the construction of the building there may be some trees that will have to be cut down. To have an arbitrary provision of this character might prevent the erection of the building.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it contemplated to use the tennis courts as the site for the building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are to be used, and more, too. They are to take out the railroad embankment, and the building will go within a relatively short distance of the Fisheries Building. I do not know just the dimensions or the extent, but the building is very large.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from New York that this is to be under the direction of the Commission of Fine Arts and that the trees are not to be destroyed further than necessary, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to speak for a few moments only.

I shall support this bill as I have supported all legislation asked for by the administration from the declaration of war to the present time. The time to differ among ourselves as to the causes and necessity for this war has passed. No one here wished to plunge this peaceful and peace-loving people into war. All that persuasion, reasoning, and diplomacy could do to prevent our entrance into this conflict was done. Every honorable means at its command was employed by this Government to avoid it. No one, except an enemy of this Government, can any longer criticize the President and Congress for declaring war nor speak against the laws that have been passed for its prosecution.

It has been charged upon this floor time and again, and I repeat it, that gentlemen in this Chamber who, directly or indirectly, speak against this war and the means employed to carry it on are rendering to the German Government a greater service than by taking up any themselves. There can be but two excuses for such conduct. Either they desire that our cause shall fail or they imagine they are rendering themselves popular at home. If they are actuated by the former motive they are disloyal to the Government and have no right to sit in this Hall. If they are seeking popularity at home they should resign their seats and let their places be filled by men worthy of the office. [Applause.]

The people of this Nation have implicit confidence in the wisdom of President Wilson, and it is our duty as representatives of the people to give to the Executive of this Republic, who is charged with the duty and responsibility of conducting the war, our whole-hearted and loyal support. It seems very strange and remarkable that any Member of this House, especially any Democratic Member, should continue to obstruct and hamper the passage of any war measure proposed by the Administration. When such eminent and distinguished men as Col. Theodore Roosevelt, Hon. William H. Taft, Judge Charles E. Hughes, and Mr. Elihu Root, all men of the opposite political faith, stand squarely behind the President and set the example for loyal patriotic service to the country, it is time for some of our Democratic brethren to quit prating about their wisdom and knowledge of constitutional law.

We can not take time now to figure on the cost of a battleship. That must be left to that branch of the Government charged with that duty. We have got to think not in millions but in billions. We have got to understand that fast destroyers to cope with German submarines must be built in great numbers; that aviators by the thousands must be trained and prepared for service; that cargo ships and transports must be constructed by the hundreds; that railroads must be built and cars and locomotives furnished; that aeroplanes must be built, so many and so fast that it will make your head swim to think about it; huge armies must be transported across the Atlantic to fight our battles. And all this only gives a faint idea of the tremendous tasks that confront our Government. Ten thousand things of immense magnitude are under way, and Congress can not falter or hesitate one minute in passing this huge measure. The trouble is too much time has been consumed during the past five months in useless and fruitless discussion. I believe in full and free debate. Broad latitude should be allowed in discussing all matters coming before this House. But all will agree that there are members here who every day occupy the floor in needless debate. They are occupying time that is especially valuable to the country in this hour, and I appeal to them to let us have less oratory and more action. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

For the installation of an additional boiler in the State, War, and Navy Department Building for heating and lighting the Mills Building, $15,000.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This debate has recently taken a rather wide and some of us think a somewhat amusing range, so I ask permission to submit two or three observations which I desire to make upon the present conditions. What I should like to say primarily is this, that most of the trouble that we are having here in Washington about the conduct of the war is due to this avalanche of patriots who have come here to tender their services to the Government, these gentlemen who are working for a dollar a year, and apparently they are working about one-third of a day. If you have any dealings with them, you find that about Thursday they must leave town and possibly return about Tuesday of the subsequent week. In the intervening days if you try to get in touch with them you will find that they have gone to lunch. I think if the Government had men who were paid a fixed salary, men who knew that they would be subject to criticism for not attending to the work they were employed to do, we would get better results; but we have this avalanche, this plague of volunteers here who are doing their "bit"—how little a bit I do not know.

Another observation that I am compelled to make is because of matters that have come to my attention and possibly to the attention of my colleagues. It is this: If Germany could be whipped overnight by the Quartermaster Corps, there would be no trouble in doing it to-morrow. That is all I have to say. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Chairman, I hate to take the time of the House, but I do not like to have the slur which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] has just cast upon the men who are coming here and volunteering their services for a dollar a year go without some response. Personally I believe it is what is saving this administration, that the services of these men are infinitely more valuable to the country than those of the paid "deserving Democrats" who could not carry the country through without them. I do not doubt the gentleman would like everybody to be paid a large salary, so that he could get his friends places with what he thinks proper remuneration.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I had no such intention in what I have said. I have asked nobody successfully to give anyone any place in this Government since I have been a member of it.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I believe these gentlemen at whom the gentleman sneered are giving valuable services to the Government in this time of stress and are contributing largely to help us conduct the affairs of the Nation as well as we are doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AVIATION.

For aviation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for procuring, producing, constructing, operating, preserving, storing, and handling aircraft; maintenance of aircraft stations; and for experimental work in the development of aviation for naval purposes, $35,000,000. Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for drafting, clerical, inspection, and messenger service for aircraft stations shall not exceed $175,000.

NAVAL EMERGENCY FUND.

To enable the President to secure the more economical and expeditious delivery of materials, equipment, and munitions and secure the more expeditious construction of ships authorized, and for the purchase or construction of such additional torpedo-boat destroyers, submarine chasers, and such other naval small craft, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, as the President may direct, to be expended at the direction and in the discretion of the President, $100,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I take it this $100,000,000 appropriation is similar in its purposes to the $100,000,000 item we passed yesterday granting unlimited authority to the Secretary of War for the purchase of arms and munitions. Is this supplemental to the $100,000,000 which we placed in the hands of the President at the outbreak of the war to be utilized for any purpose that he saw fit in advancing its cause?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; this $100,000,000 is to be used for specific purposes. It is to be used to obtain additional torpedo destroyers. It anticipated the larger program for destroyers, for which provision is specifically made, and it was carried in this form because other destroyers had been contracted for, and some have been contracted for out of the previous appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this item is not limited only to destroyers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the purpose to use it for destroyers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, under the phraseology the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, can utilize it for the purchase of materials, equipment, and munitions needed for the naval program—

Mr. FITZGERALD. The specific purpose for which it is to be expended was pointed out to the committee. The advisability was considered for a time of consolidating it with the $325,000,000 authorization, but because appropriations had been previously made in this form, out of which allotments had been made for destroyers, and this was a continuation of that particular work, we thought it more desirable to keep it in this form.

The Clerk read as follows:

Batteries and outfits for vessels: For batteries and outfits for naval vessels, auxiliaries, patrols, aircraft, naval stations, and merchantmen, $22,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 2, strike out the sum "$25,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$40,146,120: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contract or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $15,146,120 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall that the gentleman from New York referred to this particular item in his introductory remarks and I think we should have a brief explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is one of the matters which had been transmitted to the committee after the bill had been completed, and upon investigation made subsequent to the reporting of the bill it was agreed upon as a committee amendment. It is part of the project to obtain the necessary ammunition for the guns that are being provided for the one group of torpedo destroyers which are being built out of the emergency fund and for which the allotment for guns and ammunition was insufficient to supply, and for the additional ammunition required for the guns that are also authorized to be placed upon merchant ships. The gentleman is aware that the bill contains provision for a program of acquiring 1,172 merchant vessels. All of those vessels are to be armed and those amendments are to supply the money to enable the Navy Department to begin the work of procuring the guns and ammunition to supply all the ships as they are built.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 5, strike out "$22,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$50,059,523.50: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contract or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $28,059,523.50 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think some explanation ought to be given of this amendment, as it was not considered by the committee—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it was considered by the subcommittee.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it was not submitted in the printed total of new amendments submitted to the full committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What happened was this, that when the committee made this investigation the information about those items was not sufficiently satisfactory to induce the committee to recommend the amendment, and the officials of the Navy Department were requested to furnish additional information. Yesterday morning the representatives of the Navy Department appeared before the committee, and, upon the information being furnished, members unanimously agreed on these items. This is a companion amendment to the previous one. It is to provide the ammunition and guns for the torpedo destroyers that are authorized in the $100,000,000 emergency fund, and to supplement the allotment out of which the emergency fund for the ordnance for the torpedo destroyers are constructed, and also to enable the Navy Department to obtain the necessary guns and ammunition for the merchant ships that have been authorized in this bill. The proposal is to arm every ship. It requires a very large number to arm the 1,172 ships. We originally placed 3-inch guns upon those merchant ships, but the submarine boats are now carrying a heavy type of gun, which outranges the 3-inch gun, so a heavier type of gun has to be provided to give these ships adequate protection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reserve ordnance supplies: For reserve and miscellaneous ordnance supplies, $30,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 7, strike out "$30,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$47,500,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned, not to exceed $17,500,000, in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this statement that appears in the public press this morning in reference to this ordinance is true, namely, that millions of bad cartridges have been discovered, testimony to that effect being given by Col. Montgomery yesterday before the committee, and is this appropriation to replace that bad ammunition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the investigation being conducted by the Committee on Military Affairs relative to the alleged defective ammunition. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has made an inquiry regarding it and the Committee on Appropriations of the House has made an inquiry regarding it. I do not wish to anticipate the report that will be made by the Committee on Military Affairs. But these facts are in our possession:

For some time there was difficulty with the primer in the cartridge. The first complaint was received, my recollection is, in May, and subsequently some additional complaints. The Ordnance Bureau immediately upon receipt of these complaints began investigation to ascertain the cause of the defect in the primer. The complaint was that the cartridges hung fire. And subsequent investigations developed to such a point that it was determined to recall all of the cartridges that had been manufactured between certain dates, a very large quantity of which were in possession of the troops. Word was sent to Gen. Pershing of what had been discovered regarding this ammunition, and instructions given to him as to what to do regarding it. It did not interfere in any way with the supply of ammunition, as, excluding the amount of this particular ammunition, he had more than he really needed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a minute. Let me make this statement. There was considerable difference of opinion as to whether the ammunition should be recalled or whether it was necessary to do what it is proposed shall be done. The Ordnance Bureau has determined to "break" the ammunition up, as it is called, and take out the primer and put in a primer made under a different formula. One matter was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations from a colonel of a regiment that was using this ammunition. His regiment had already expended 30,000 rounds. They had no complaint of any kind to make about it. They still had 170,000 rounds of the same ammunition, and he requested that he be permitted to retain it, as their experience with it had proved thoroughly satisfactory. The Bureau of Ordnance, however, determined that, in view of the suspicious character of the ammunition—that is, these complaints of the cartridges hanging fire, and having ascertained the reason for it—it was more desirable to withdraw it, break it up, and rebuild it. The Committee on Military Affairs is now engaged in a more exhaustive investigation to ascertain not only the causes but whether the particular fault could have been ascertained earlier than it was ascertained and just what precautions were taken, and whether other precautions should have been taken. But I have given the facts as they have been ascertained so far.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not care to have the gentleman from New York anticipate in any way any findings that may be made by the committee now investigating the matter, but from the testimony given yesterday the question arises in my mind whether or not this defective ammunition is due to incompetency or carelessness on the part of our employees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Without attempting to base an opinion upon the statement contained in the press, I wish to say to the gentleman from Kansas that from the information that the Committee on Appropriations received in its investigation of the matter I have reached the conclusion, so far as the information has been obtained, that it has not been due to our fault.

In the manufacture of ammunition there is continual trouble and difficulty experienced. The private manufacturers have it, the Government has it, and these difficulties are of innumerable kinds. The composition of the ammunition is of elements highly sensitive, difficult to handle, and subject to modification by chemical change due to change of temperature and innumerable other reasons, so that in the manufacture of ammunition in ordinary normal times considerable troubles and difficulties are arising. And I would doubt if the meager statement contained in the press is of such a character that anyone would be justified in forming a conclusion. But my experience has been, when these investigations take place and the statement is published, which on its face looks very damaging, that if the entire testimony was read it would show that there was a complete explanation of the situation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But this statement was very clearly made, that private concerns pay more for the services of chemists and therefore get better chemists than the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Private concerns pay more for services of every character.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That leaves the inference that we have incompetent chemists.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I doubt it. I think we have in our various services of the Government, employed at less compensation than private concerns pay, as competent men as are found in private industries. And there are a great many reasons within the gentleman's own knowledge that men will frequently prefer a Government position at a very less compensation to a private position.

I might cite a very striking case. I suppose the most notable man in his line is the Director of the Bureau of Standards. His compensation, I think, is $6,000 a year. Within a very recent time he was offered by one of the leading universities of the country a position with a compensation almost double his salary.

The Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, whose compensation is $6,000 a year, was offered a position upon one of the leading newspapers of the country, to take charge of the mechanical equipment, at a compensation far in excess of his compensation. But he went into the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in a very minor capacity, and by years of industry and by the exhibition of exceptional talent he came to the head of the bureau. He probably is regarded as the foremost man in the manufacture of currency in the entire world. He has been consulted by the representatives of foreign nations in the organization of Government establishments in those countries, and that man naturally has a pride in his work, and would prefer to continue in the service of the Government with the plant with which he is so intimately identified, even though it may involve a financial sacrifice. So that the statement in the press, in my opinion, can hardly be taken as a true criterion of the situation of the Government in relation to private interests.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I referred to the matter of the newspaper reports because the allegation was that these cartridges were made at the Frankford Arsenal. I do not represent the district in which this arsenal is located, but I do come from the State of Pennsylvania. The statement was made that the cartridges were defective from two causes—first, defective primers; and, second, defective chemicals.

I have no doubt the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is correct when he says the chemicals will deteriorate, and on that account the munitions become worthless. But when millions of these cartridges deteriorate there must be something wrong, and much worse than the mere deterioration of the chemicals.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I stated to the gentleman that there was very serious question as to whether all of these cartridges should be called in and broken up, and I mentioned the communication from the colonel of one regiment as to his experience.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the chemicals that was used in the manufacture of these primers until very recent times, if I recall correctly, was obtained in Germany, and after we were unable to get the chemical from Germany we suffered considerable difficulty in obtaining as pure an ingredient as it had been possible to obtain from the German element, and that has happened in many instances. The cutting off of our supply from Germany of some things has seriously affected a number of industries, and this chemical affected the manufacture of these primers.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is so serious a matter that I thought it proper to call the attention of the committee to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a serious matter, and the House has appreciated its seriousness by ordering a thorough investigation and appointing a special committee to conduct the investigation. That committee is now at work, and these statements from day to day as to what is disclosed there can not be relied on, in view of the fact that the committee is not holding public hearings, for the reason that in the course of this investigation there necessarily must be stated some matters so intimately connected with the public defense that they can not be made public, and only fragments of what transpires there reach the press,

It is impossible, therefore, to form any accurate conclusion as to what is happening or what has happened in regard to ammunition.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am glad to hear that, because no greater calamity could befall the American forces in France than to confront the enemy with defective ammunition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I stated, while some of this ammunition was sent to France, the fact of its defects was noticed here and instruction was given to Gen. Pershing as to the destruction of that ammunition, and inasmuch as he has more ammunition in addition to this particular class, it in no way interferes with the necessary supply that he has.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stations: For improvements at stations under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Ordnance, $2,250,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 53, after line 8, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"The appropriation of $10,000 for expenses of the commission of naval officers to investigate the question of navy yards and naval stations contained in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917 is continued and made available during the fiscal year 1918."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs of barracks: For repairs of barracks, Marine Corps, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, $500,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 54, after line 8, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

"Toward the construction of additional torpedo-boat destroyers and for acquiring and providing facilities for their expeditious construction, to cost complete, including armor and armament and such other expenses as may be incidental thereto, not exceeding $350,000,000, the sum of $225,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above enumerated not to exceed $125,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire what the total amount is in this amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This amendment carries $225,000,000 in cash, with authority to incur direct obligations to the extent of $125,000,000 in addition. It is the provision which I mentioned in my opening remarks on the bill to initiate the program of constructing 150 additional torpedo-boat destroyers.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if it would be proper for him to tell us whether these are of the large size torpedo-boat destroyers or of the smaller size?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are of the larger size, and it is hoped that they will all be of the high speed. One of the difficulties that will be encountered, however, will be in the obtaining of turbines. The intention is to make these of the larger size that have heretofore been constructed.

Mr. FOSS. Presumably of the size that was authorized a year ago?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSS. I want to say to the gentleman that I am heartily in favor of this authorization. I believe that the torpedo-boat destroyer will prove to be the most effective weapon in this submarine struggle. We now have a number of them in our Navy. A number of years ago we authorized torpedo-boat destroyers of about 400 tons. Since that time we have tripled them in tonnage, so that now we are building them of 1,200 tons, and they prove to be very effective vessels. I am heartily in favor of this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC-LAND SERVICE.

The appropriation of $25,000 for the protection of lands involved in the Oregon and California forfeiture suit, contained in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, is also made available for the protection of the lands known as the Coos Bay Wagon Road lands involved in the case of Southern Oregon Co. v. United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 55, line 17, after the word "States," insert the following: "together with the additional sum of $10,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Authority is granted to expend from the appropriations for the construction and operation of railroads in Alaska, not exceeding $750, for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of one motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicle for official use of the Alaskan Engineering Commission at Seattle, Wash.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee how much money has been spent at this time on the new Alaskan Railroad, to which reference is made in this paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been appropriated $21,000,000.

Mr. SLOAN. How much of that has been expended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not say how much has been expended, except of the money heretofore appropriated a very large proportion was spent in the acquisition of supplies that were required, and this $4,000,000 is money essential to enable them to utilize those supplies. A different system had to be adopted for the construction of the Alaskan Railway than is usually adopted elsewhere. Because of the distance from market, supplies had to be accumulated far in advance of the progress of the work. Taking advantage of the favorable market at the time considerably larger quantities were purchased than were needed on a particular portion of the road in contemplation. These supplies are all in Alaska, and unless the additional money is appropriated, the force would be disbanded and great deterioration would result in some supplies from the lack of utilization. It was thought desirable to push the work at this time, because during the coming season it is expected to complete the connection with Matanuska coal fields and Seward, which will be of considerable importance to the west coast if the coal situation becomes at all menacing, provided that bottoms can be obtained to carry the coal.

Mr. SLOAN. Approximately how much more money will it take after this appropriation to complete the Alaskan Railway as originally contemplated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the original estimate of the road from Seward to Fairbanks, the limit of cost was $35,000,000. My recollection is that the estimate of acquiring the road from Seward to Mile 71, and then for constructing the road from Mile 71 to Fairbanks, including a spur of 35 miles from Matanuska coal fields, was $28,000,000. The early work was done within the estimates. I am inclined to think now that in view of the increased cost of labor the cost may be running over the estimate.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. How many miles of road have been constructed and already in operation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We first purchased the Alaskan Northern from Seward to Mile 71, and we have rehabilitated and strengthened that so as to enable it to take heavy equipment.

Mr. NORTON. That was an old road already constructed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but the culverts, bridges, and roadbeds were all inadequate. The track has also been laid from Anchorage to Rabbit Creek; that is, along Turnagain Arm, connecting Anchorage with Mile 71. The most difficult part of the work is the heavy construction north of the main line toward Fairbanks, 61 miles, and on the branch leading to Matanuska coal fields, Matanuska Junction, and King River, on the western edge of the coal fields, a distance of 24 miles. All these stretches aggregate 166 miles, which are now being operated.

Since that time further progress has been made as that statement was made several months ago. There is a gap between the old Alaskan Northern from Mile 72 to Anchorage of about 30 miles. When that 30 miles is completed there will be rail communication from Seward to the Matanuska coal fields; they have already reached the edge, but it is intended to go farther in.

Mr. NORTON. How far is the terminus of the road from Fairbanks?

Mr. HOUSTON. Four hundred and seventy miles.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Four hundred and seventy miles from Seward to Fairbanks, but the chief thing that was attempted to be accomplished speedily was to get into the Matanuska coal fields. There has been, in addition, work done along other portions of the main line beyond 61 miles from Anchorage northward.

Mr. NORTON. The most difficult part of the construction is that near Seward, about 100 miles north.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The stretch along the Turnagain Arm, which is heavy rock formation and consists all of heavy blasting work, is the most difficult.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will allow me, there are 189 miles of rail laid and in operation, with a gap in it of about 30 miles. In addition, there is a road completed from Fairbanks toward the Nenana coal fields, which makes in operation to date 192 miles, including 9 miles going out from Nenana.

Mr. NORTON. The 9 miles at Fairbanks is in operation.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; 9 miles from the end of the road as now laid from Nenana.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATURALIZATION SERVICE.

For an additional amount for allotment to clerks of courts for clerical assistance in naturalization proceedings in accordance with the provisions of the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, $30,000: Provided, That all mail matter, of whatever class, relating to naturalization, including duplicate papers required by law or regulation to be sent to the Bureau of Naturalization by clerks of State or Federal courts, addressed to the Department of Labor, or the Bureau of Naturalization, or to any official thereof, and indorsed "Official business," shall be transmitted free of postage, and by registered mail if necessary, and so marked: Provided further, That if any person shall make use of such indorsement to avoid payment of postage or registry fee on his or her private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 63, in line 3, after the word "Provided," insert: "That the allotment for the foregoing purpose heretofore made from the appropriation of $275,000 for naturalization expenses for the fiscal year 1918 shall not be reduced during the said fiscal year."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the widow of Daniel W. Comstock, late a Representative from the State of Indiana, $7,500.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at the end of line 4, page 64, a new paragraph, as follows:

"Authority is hereby given to expend not to exceed $250 of the appropriation of $35,000 to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies, made in the act approved February 3, 1917, regardless of the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be entirely frank with the committee and say that this same matter was brought to the attention of the committee during the last session of Congress, and at that time I believe the point of order was made; at least, a similar provision was defeated. Let me make a brief statement: During the time of the last inauguration and preceding that a joint committee composed of three Senators and three Members of the House, the three Members of the House being the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCKINLEY, and myself, had charge of the inaugural ceremonies. We followed the course which the same committee had previously followed and secured the services of Mr. McGrain, a Deputy Sergeant at Arms, to assist us in preparing for distribution the very large number of tickets which were distributed to Members of the House and Members of the Senate. As on the occasion of other inaugurations this service was performed by an employee of the Government and heretofore has been paid for. Your committee believed we had authority to contract for this work and to pay for it. I will say frankly, so far as I am concerned, that I knew nothing about that statute, an old statute, which prohibits the payment of money for extra services rendered by an employee of the Government; but even if we had known of that statute, I feel that we would have been justified in entering into a stipulation to pay for this service, for the reason that there is an abundance of precedents for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes,

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, this matter was the subject of considerable debate in the House during the closing days of the last Congress?

Mr. RUCKER. Some debate; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is for an emolument to some Senate employee. This bill is going to the Senate. Why not let the Senate look after their own employees rather than establish a dangerous precedent by having the House do it?

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say this to the gentleman in response, I am perfectly content to pursue that course, except that when the Senate inserted this item once before by way of amendment, the House conferees struck it out in conference, though at the same time the conference committee left in some other matters identically on all fours with this amendment. I will say further that each member of our committee—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY], and myself—received a letter recently from Senator OVERMAN asking us to pursue this course. There is no question but that a similar amendment will be agreed to in the Senate if this fails. The question now is what the House will do. I want to say before the point of order is finally insisted upon that we are not personally responsible for this debt, but your committee, in good faith, believing that we were doing that which the House would fully indorse and approve, agreed to pay this man $250 for his services, and he ought to be paid.

Mr. DYER. How much is asked?

Mr. RUCKER. Two hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Just one other statement I desire to make. If we had not engaged this party, who had had experience and who is quite proficient, the House would have gladly permitted your committee to employ some other person to help us, and we could not have secured the services of a competent man to do the work for less than the sum proposed in this amendment.

Mr. WALSH. This is to pay a Senate employee for doing a little extra work outside of his ordinary employment?

Mr. RUCKER. I will say to the gentleman that he does not state the matter quite fairly. It was more than a little extra work. It was considerable work, requiring very great care and accuracy.

Mr. WALSH. Some considerable extra work. The members of the House committee did a great deal of extra work, did they not; and why is it not just as fair to pay the members of the committee extra compensation?

Mr. RUCKER. I will say to the gentleman that we were so glad to serve our colleagues and hoped that we were serving them so well—

Mr. WALSH. Which the committee did.

Mr. RUCKER. That we thought you would permit us to expend the amount of money we were authorized to expend and obtain such assistance, within the appropriation as we needed; but the gentleman knows we could not think of accepting compensation for our poor services.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I happen to know something about the large amount of work the committee had to do under the circumstances, and I know something about the additional services rendered; but apart from that, it seems to me that objection should not be raised. We have been undergoing the experience of passing through this House millions, tens of millions, hundreds of millions, and billions of dollars, and I think, I know I would, I believe the rest of the House would, enjoy the sensation of permitting a $250 item to pass through without objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, it has not grown any since the work was done. Let me say to the gentleman the work was well done by the gentleman to whom this $250 is due, and, in my judgment, it could not have been performed so well by anybody else we could have gotten, because in securing him we brought into requisition his experience, which was of great value to our committee. I believe another member of this committee is here [Mr. MCKINLEY], and he can speak for himself. I know I speak for Mr. GARRETT and am sure the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] concurs in what I have said.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order withdrawn? The Chair will consider the point of order to be withdrawn—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this request comes from the joint committee of the two Houses on a matter they were charged with looking after by concurrent resolution of the two Houses, I am willing to let the House determine the matter without insisting upon the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order.

Mr. RUCKER. I wish the gentleman would withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Revised Statutes prohibit a Government employee from receiving extra compensation, and this amendment changes that law, and therefore is obnoxious to it, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $3,000.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I will not impose upon the committee and plead with gentlemen, but I do want to say, speaking for myself and those who helped me to perform an arduous duty and service to the membership of this House, that it comes with really poor grace, after the chairman of the committee has waived the right to make the point of order, which I concede was proper—

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say on the occasion of a former inauguration these services were performed by the same employee or some other employee?

Mr. RUCKER. Not by the same employee, but by another employee holding the same position this man now holds.

Mr. MONDELL. And they were paid?

Mr. RUCKER. They were paid; and not only that, but in every session of Congress gentlemen knowingly vote for items carried in bills that are upon the same footing as this item is.

Mr. MONDELL. Then your committee employed this man, whom you believe to be efficient, and he did perform the work efficiently?

Mr. RUCKER. I stated that.

Mr. MONDELL. In view of former precedents and with the understanding that he could be paid?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not want to make that statement without qualification. We employed him because of his known efficiency. He performed a service that no one will criticize. I think everybody will concede it was superbly well performed. This $250 is within the amount appropriated for inaugural expenses. After paying this $250 there would still be something like $1,000 going back into the Treasury unexpended.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The thing I would like to know is whether the gentleman thinks it desirable for Congress to pass a law of this kind, that seems to me in direct conflict with the Federal statute on the same subject. In other words, while I believe the allowance should be made, if it can be done legally and would not interpose any point of order, the question in my mind is whether it is a good thing for us to violate our own laws.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, I will say to the gentleman it is not a good thing to violate law, and yet at this very session of Congress we will vote for appropriations to pay extra compensation to certain gentlemen who help committees of the House. I think at every session of Congress an extra allowance is made over and above their salaries to pay the expert examiners who assist the Committees on Pensions and Invalid Pensions, as well as in numerous other cases. I have a memorandum of the number of such instances, but I will not abuse the courtesy and patience of the committee. I regret the gentleman from Wisconsin feels that he is constrained to make the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the Official Reporters of debates $500 each and the official stenographers to committees $300 each for moneys actually and necessarily expended by them to August 31, 1917, $4,200.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 64, after line 16, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For the procurement of an oil portrait of CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of the House of Representatives, $2,000."

[Applause.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was unanimously agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Government Printing Office.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 64, line 17, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"To pay Samuel Robinson, William Madden, and Joseph de Fontes, messengers on night duty during the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, for extra services, $700; in all, $2,100."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay, etc., of the Army, $5,349.05.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question.

On page 68, line 21, I find that which is to me rather unusual language. I do not think I ever saw it in a bill before. It is, "For pay, and so forth." What does that mean?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where it is an audited claim and the wording of a provision is quite lengthy, this is sufficient description to enable the appropriation to be available, and the practice has been in vogue a great many years to print it in this way and save the necessity of printing a very lengthy description.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Has it been stated in that way in former legislation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been customary.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The reason I ask is, I never saw anything of this kind before.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is only in an item of this character, where it is an audited claim and money could not possibly be used for any other purposes, that that expression is used.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 3. That the appropriations contained herein under the Military and Naval Establishments shall be available for the payment of obligations on account of the existing emergency incurred prior to the passage of this act and which are properly chargeable to such appropriations.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose, if I may temporarily have the attention of the gentleman from New York, of asking whether there are certain definite items to which it is expected to apply this provision—that is, certain contracts that have heretofore been made—or whether this is a sweeping provision intended to cover almost anything?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Anticipating favorable action by Congress, both the military and naval services have proceeded with plans deemed essential for the conduct of the war without waiting for either the authority or the appropriation. There was one matter of very vital concern that, had it not been done, would have very seriously affected the situation. Most of these estimates—at least 70 per cent of them—were submitted to Congress early in July. The Appropriation Committee began investigations the 16th of July and worked continuously during July and August, until we were able to present the bill to the House. The committee was informed about a number of these matters, and it was apparent the bill would not become a law until in the vicinity of the 1st of October. There was a sort of tacit agreement that it was desirable to immediately enter into obligations so as to avoid very serious delay that otherwise would have been incurred. It is a practice that ordinarily is not tolerated, but it was one at this time that seemed to be inevitable.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think the explanation given by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is quite sufficient to justify this provision, and it seems to me needful and proper at this time. But I hope that at some future date, in some way—I can not just imagine how, if the same opposition continues as it has heretofore—we may learn something as to what these items are and for what this money has been spent, as it doubtless will be spent, under this provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that the information is contained in the hearings.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will have to differ slightly from the gentleman from New York and say that this provision is so broad that all of this information can not be given in the hearings; that this money can be used for matters which are not provided for in the hearings and are not mentioned in them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman understands this makes the moneys appropriated in this bill available for payments upon contracts for the purposes which the bill authorized prior to the enactment of the bill into law. So that this ratification is of action anticipating the authority and appropriations conferred in this bill, and the information I have, as I have said, is all contained in the hearings.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from New York misunderstands me if he thinks I am objecting to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not. I understood the gentleman to say he hoped the time would come when we could get information about the particular contracts that were being ratified. All that this does, and all that has been done is this: For instance, in the plans to procure heavy ordnance not only is it necessary to make the contract—and it takes very considerable time to manufacture the ordnance—but it is necessary in order to obtain ordnance and other materials for the Government to create facilities that do not exist. Negotiations were commenced with different concerns, and it was difficult to get an individual or a corporation to agree to start to expend money when there was no authority and no appropriation. But some were induced to do so, and contracts were made, and concerns have gone on with the carrying out of the contracts. This provision in effect legalizes those contracts and makes it possible for the accounts to be passed by the auditor, when otherwise they would not be. The same situation arose when the first deficiency bill came up. As soon as war was declared the War Department and Navy Department placed very extensive orders for various matters, and then when the inquiry was made their action was ratified, because it was realized that to have waited three or four months would have very seriously delayed them. And the inquiry was made regarding the matters and purposes, and they are set forth quite fully in the hearings. The point that I wish to make is that this is not to cover up or to ratify some contract about which it was not desired to furnish information. It was merely to expedite the delivery by making the contract three months in anticipation of the time when the money would actually be provided.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, because of the careful management and attention which the gentleman from New York has given to the provisions of the bill—as he always does—I had every reason to presume, without asking my question, that this provision was justified and necessary.

My inquiry was really intended to lead up to some other matters. I had not supposed for a moment that the gentleman from New York desired to cover up anything. I know perfectly well that, so far as his own work is concerned, there is no gentleman in the House that is more ready than he to have every portion of it exposed to the light, but for that same reason I have been somewhat surprised that he and some other gentlemen have been somewhat unwilling that the transactions of other parties should not also be exposed to the light. I am not very much concerned over the blunders and mistakes which have already been made in this war, because I know that blunders and mistakes are inevitable in such an emergency as this, but I am concerned that they should not be made again, and that the country should know when they are made and how they happened to have been made.

For that reason I have favored the creation of a committee to in some way supervise these accounts.

The nations that have been at war have all, possibly with the exception of Germany, whose thrift and efficiency are so well known, made mistakes and blunders innumerable. We have an opportunity to profit by these errors to some extent, but we will not be able to profit by them to the extent we should unless such a committee as I have referred to is established, to correct our own mistakes and blunders.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A committee such as the gentleman refers to would have no executive functions and would have no authority to exercise in the making of these contracts. Does not the gentleman think that the committees on expenditures in the Senate and House, particularly the Committees on Expenditures in the War Department and the Navy Department, now have the authority and possess all the necessary functions to make these investigations and ascertain whether the money has been honestly and properly expended, and also to ascertain whether or not it has been expended in the most effective way possible?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It must be conceded, of course, that such a committee should have no executive functions, but it does not therefore follow that it should have no useful functions. On the contrary, there is nothing that would tend to prevent inefficiency and waste so much as to turn on the light.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman say whether there has been a single meeting of any one of these several committees on expenditures in all the five months of this session of Congress?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am unable to say definitely, but my information is that they have not met.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman see any indication of a gathering together by any of these committees mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. On the contrary, there is every indication that the committees not only have not met, but do not intend to meet.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is no argument that these committees do not have the power and the authority to make just such investigations as the gentleman refers to. I must say that I heartily agree with the gentleman. Every particle of light possible ought to be turned on these transactions. But to say that these committees on expenditures have not thus far made these investigations is not an argument against their performance of the duties for which they are constituted, and the remedy is in this House if any committee of this House has failed to perform its duty.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, if my friend from Tennessee will kindly permit me to resume, I beg to differ with him on that. There is every reason why there should be a special committee whose express duty would be to look after these matters, so that there would be no failure to perform that duty.

I want to call the attention of the House to the experience of other countries in this respect, and particularly with reference to England. There was recently published an article called "Kitchener's mob" by a young man of my own State who was a member of the first army organized under the direction of Gen. Kitchener. In that article he describes at some length the great amount of waste that occurred in the camp that was then formed and of the money that was needlessly squandered in connection with it.

But that was not the most serious trouble with reference to the conduct of the war by England. It was discovered not long after the war had progressed—in fact, as soon as the English troops got fairly into the fighting line and in the operations—that their finest regiments were being slaughtered without any effect except to reduce the strength of the English Army. There was no investigation of the matter. Apparently, as was stated by some gentleman, their procedure over there was very much like what ours is over here. There was great opposition to investigation. Thereupon some newspaper men instituted investigations on their own behalf and discovered the causes of the failure of the war at that time, with the result that incompetent generals were removed, a new supply of artillery and ammunition was furnished to the army, new methods were undertaken, and the army after that made some progress.

At the opening of the war on the part of the French the French Army suffered one series of defeats after another, and as the result of it Gen. Joffre shortly before the Battle of the Marne—and very fortunately for the success of the French Army—removed some 22 French generals for incompetence and mismanagement. But we, it seems, are not to learn by our failures, by our mistakes, and ascertain the cause of our want of success. These matters are not to be brought before the public for fear it will in some way interfere with the management of the war.

Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that that will be the case. I do not believe it was the case during the Civil War, but, on the contrary, the committee that was appointed at that time, which had far broader powers than it is now proposed to be conferred on any committee, was of vast service to the country in pointing out the cause of failures on the part of the Union armies in that war and needless waste of the public money and property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not care to go on further.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for five minutes. I have not taken time heretofore.

Mr. DYER. The matter is not before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] as to the importance of every possible publicity being given to contracts and to expenditures made by the Government, not only during this war and in the present emergency but at all times.

I believe that every contract that is made, every dollar of the money that is being appropriated by Congress, the manner of expenditure of the immense sums carried in this and previous bills, should be scrutinized most carefully by all of the Government officials, and particularly by Congress and its committees having jurisdiction of such matters. But I have not been able to bring myself to the conclusion that any good purpose could be served by the creation and appointment of a committee such as that to which the gentleman from Iowa refers.

I know that from time to time, both here and elsewhere, the statement has been made that unfair contracts have been entered into, and in some cases money improperly expended. As a matter of fact these statements have been based on rumor as was demonstrated at the time, or possibly disclosed after the statements were made. For my part, I believe that every Member of this House will concur with me when I say that I feel sure there is no head of an important bureau, either in the War or the Navy Department, who is not anxious to subserve the public interest. It is true that some of them, in my judgment, are not as economical in expenditures as we would like them to be. It is true that possibly in the making of some of these contracts and in the expenditure of some of this money, they may be more anxious to quickly attain the ends for which they are striving than they are to save the public money; but I repeat, and I am sure no Member of this House is prepared to charge, that the head of an important bureau in any of these departments has or will hereafter make a contract or expend the public money in a knowingly improper way.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It has been charged in a Cleveland newspaper that a contract was made for aeroplanes that ought to be looked into; that the contract was made with a firm which had among its members a brother of the Secretary of War. That has not been mentioned on the floor of this House in any investigation that has been made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that the only criticism of the contract?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is one.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that the only criticism, that a member of the firm was a brother of the Secretary of War?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; that is not the only criticism. The criticism was that the contract was for grossly high prices.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who made the charge?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A Cleveland newspaper.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Secretary of War was mayor of Cleveland for three years.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is no answer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It might make some people somewhat anxious to make the charge without intelligent knowledge of the relations that exist between the newspaper and the former mayor of the city. The mere fact that a person doing business with the Government is related to some Government official does not require investigation and does not justify charges of impropriety in the making of a contract. It seems to me that unless the gentleman from Kansas is anxious to assume the responsibility for the correctness of the newspaper charges, he should not repeat them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not know anything about them; I only know that there has been a refusal to make investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is unfair to use that as a basis. If the Congress is to attempt to investigate every statement of a newspaper of some impropriety existing in the conduct of the war, it would not complete useless investigations that would be ordered in a hundred years. The gentleman from Kansas recently had some experience in an investigation into which the House was stampeded, and he knows what the result was.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Kansas to say that he is not prepared to state that the newspaper publication relative to some contract for the construction of aeroplanes having been improperly let is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. All I say is that the newspaper published the fact that the contract was for grossly high prices, and that we could not get aeroplanes enough for the needs of the Government for the appropriations that were made on account of these high prices that were to be paid.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know nothing about any contract for building aeroplanes, but if there are contracts that have been improperly let, if contracts have been made giving inordinate profits to those who are to fulfill the contracts, the Congress and this House have authority to remedy the matter without the necessity of appointing a special committee such as has been advocated, a committee which would undoubtedly hamper the arm of the Executive, who is charged with the duty and responsibility under the Constitution of conducting the war.

It may be true that in this great emergency and on account of the vital necessity of quick action, contracts have been made which would be subject to the most serious criticism if made in normal times, and I am not sure that I would have given my approval to some of the contracts heretofore made, even in these times. The cost plus percentage contract has never appealed to me because I recognize the possibility of padding against the Government by a contractor who might be disposed to unduly increase his profits. But we must not overlook the fact that our Government has been confronted by an abnormal situation. These contracts had to be made in a hurry. There was not always that time for deliberation essential for the making of the most desirable contracts possible. We are engaged in a war which is fraught with the gravest consequences. Time is a most important factor. The beginning of the war found us unprepared in so far as our Army and supplies were concerned. If, therefore, in the hurry incident to a necessary and quick preparation, contracts have been made which will bring about inordinate war profits to the holders of any of these contracts, then I am in favor of passing a revenue bill which will heavily tax these excess profits and put them back into the Treasury of the people, where they belong.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Committee on Appropriations has been dealing with appropriations for aviation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The aircraft bill came from the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Appropriations has had nothing to do with it. But I will say to the gentleman that during all the long, hot days of summer, when most of the Members were away from the city, and properly so, certain members of the Appropriations Committee have been sitting day after day for the purpose of investigating and holding hearings upon expenditures which are proposed to be made by the Government. I have not taken a particularly conspicuous part in these hearings, although I was constant and regular in my attendance, and I think, therefore, that I may be permitted to say that the Committee on Appropriations has rendered a great service to the House and the country in these investigations which have been made and which are set forth in these hearings. [Applause.] Gentlemen of the House may take these hearings, covering as they do more than a thousand pages, and may see for themselves such contracts as have been made and what these officials propose to do with the money appropriated in this bill. All of the items and matters covered in this immense appropriation bill have been inquired into in the most careful, exhaustive, and painstaking way, and there is no reason for any Member not knowing just what those charged with the responsibility of expending this money have stated concerning their purposes if he will only have the patience to read this large volume of hearings. More than this the committee could not do at this time. Neither can Congress do more, for it is not charged with the duty or responsibility of expending these sums. It does have the power of investigating the manner of expenditure, and it should exercise this power.

As I said a while ago in my colloquy with the gentleman from Iowa, there are other committees which also have duties to perform in this House. The committees on expenditures in the departments, and particularly those in the departments which have to do with the war, have a great opportunity for service to the House and to the country, because they have the authority to follow up these appropriations and to investigate not only how the money is expended but also to investigate and report as to whether or not the money appropriated has been used in the most effective possible way.

And while I am on this subject let me say that these hearings which have been held by the Appropriations Committee have demonstrated the fact that it is not necessary to appoint what the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] some time ago characterized as a snooping committee for the purpose of interfering in matters which under our form of government are vested solely in the President of the United States. Congress has no executive functions. Congress makes the appropriations and it is the duty of the executive branch of the Government to expend the appropriations so made in the best possible manner, and I do not believe that Congress ought to put itself in a position where it might be charged with undertaking to appoint a committee which might hamper the executive branch of the Government in the conduct of this war, and, more than that, afford an opportunity, if expenditures are improperly made, for a division of responsibility. We ought to hold those who are charged with this duty strictly responsible for what they do under these appropriations which are placed in their hands. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill carries the largest appropriation ever carried in any bill during the entire history of the Government. The committee, as a result of a long and patient investigation, has been able to reduce the estimates submitted by a very considerable sum, but in no case has there been a reduction when it was apparent that the money asked for was necessary to the successful carrying on of the war. Your committee has had in mind as its paramount purpose the winning of the war, and while it has very earnestly sought to reduce the appropriations just as much as it was possible to do so, it has not sought to bring about this result in a manner which would cripple and hamper the administration in the prosecution of the war or at the expense of the brave boys who are going to fight in the trenches. I am quite sure that every Member of the House and that every loyal American is in accord with this view. I am not prepared to say that every single dollar of the immense sum carried in this bill is absolutely necessary at this time, and I am sure that no member of the committee which had to do with the preparation of this bill is willing to make such a statement. In peace times and under normal conditions the committee might be able to make such a statement with a reasonable degree of certainty, but not so with the immense sums carried in this bill for war purposes. In such cases we have been compelled in a large measure to rely on the judgment and estimates of those whose business it is to prosecute this war, and we have allowed such sums as were asked for strictly war purposes when reasonable arguments were presented showing the necessity. Less than this we could not do without running the risk of hampering the administration, prolonging the war, and causing a greater loss of life among those who will bravely fight our battles.

But let me say that it is not only the duty of Members of Congress but of every one connected with the Government, particularly those whose duty it is to submit estimates, to remember that the vast sums of money already appropriated and which will be needed in the future if this war continues must be paid by taxes gathered in one form or another from the people. With the immense burdens which the people must carry during this war, it would be no less than a crime to unduly increase those burdens by extravagant and unnecessary appropriations. I regret to say that one can not follow these hearings without coming to the conclusion that there is in some quarters a disposition, under the plea of war emergency, to ask for largely increased appropriations for not strictly war measures, although they may have an indirect but not important relation thereto. These your committee have not recommended. I hope that in the future and during the continuance of this war none such will be asked. I do not wish to see any proper activity of the Government unduly hampered by a want of the necessary funds, but I do believe that everything should be subordinated for the time being to the early and successful winning of this war in which we are now engaged, and that not only should there be no increases, but that every other expense not absolutely necessary should be eliminated while the people are being called upon to pay the heavy price, both in lives and money in the conduct of the war. The people are willing to pay the price of victory and a permanent peace, heavy though the burden may be. They certainly should not be taxed with unnecessary expenditures at this time, however beneficent the object, or however advantageous they might be in normal times.

Mr. Chairman, in this bill and in previous appropriation bills, Congress has responded freely to the needs of the administration in providing all the money necessary to carry on the war. It will continue to do so, for such is its plain duty. It would not be justified in doing otherwise. We are in this war to win, and every dollar necessary for that purpose will be furnished, however great may be the sum required. But the strictest scrutiny should be given to every sum that is asked and appropriated and every expenditure that is made. Less than this we can not do and fulfill our duty to those whom we represent.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 5. That section 6 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved May 10, 1916, as amended by the naval appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, shall not apply to teachers in the public schools of the District of Columbia who are also employed as teachers of night schools and vacation schools.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is a provision designed to give the higher priced teachers in the District of Columbia an opportunity to collect a second salary. There is a statute on the books forbidding any employee of the Government who draws compensation based upon a rate of $2,000 a year or more from receiving any additional compensation or emolument. The express wording of this provision is to repeal that provision so far as the teachers of the District of Columbia are concerned. Therefore, it is new legislation, and has no place in this bill. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this matter was considered by the subcommittee, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and myself were appointed to draft an amendment to correct some defects in some legislation which was discovered by the decision of the comptroller. In the last legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, in charge of a subcommittee which is presided over by the gentleman from Tennessee

[Mr. BYRNS], we drafted a provision to prevent any one person in a department drawing two salaries where one salary was $2,000 or more. The committee did not at the time think it would affect the teachers in the District of Columbia. The Comptroller of the Currency in figuring upon the salary of a school-teacher, however, applied the statute to them and figured the amount received for each day of work. Therefore a school-teacher getting as much, say, as $1,200 per session of 10 months could not under the decision of the comptroller in the summer-school and night-school work draw any additional pay. A certain amount of night-school work is done, for example, where the young men are trained for employment in the navy yards; and if a member of the navy yard should be detailed or volunteer to go and do some work at night and teach in the night schools, training the young men who wanted to take that training, he could draw no pay for the school work if his rate of pay was more than $2,000 in the navy yard. This greatly hampers this work of fitting young men who desire places in the navy yard, because all of them are poor and have to work in the daytime and therefore can not go to school.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This refers to school-teachers.

Mr. SISSON. I mean in the technical training they do here in the night schools or in the summer schools. They take men from the navy yards to train these young men in this technical training in the schools.

They are working in the navy yard, and although they may be working piecework or on regular pay in the navy yard, if their rate of pay is $2,000 they can not get any of this pay out of the money appropriated for night-school work and summer-school work. Not only that, but the higher and better grade of teachers in the normal-school work in the summer time are excluded from teaching in the summer schools in the District of Columbia, and if the normal-school work continues they are compelled to take the lower grade of teachers. I state to the committee that it was not the intention of the subcommittee of the House or the Senate that considered the question of people in the Government drawing $2,000 to in any way disturb this work in the District of Columbia. It was foreign to the minds of the committee, it was foreign to the minds of the members of the subcommittee in the Senate; and I am not criticizing the decision of the comptroller, for the language is perhaps broad enough to reach those in the employment of the Government as teachers. That not being the intention of the committee or of Congress, when the attention of the subcommittee was called to it this amendment was offered. Unquestionably it is legislation upon an appropriation bill. I had hoped that the gentleman from Missouri would not make the point of order, because they figured the rate of pay that a teacher gets, and if he is getting a rate that exceeds $2,000, although the salary actually received might be very much less than $2,000, they can not do this work that would supplement their salaries in the summer time and enable them to give the benefit of their counsel. Therefore your subcommittee felt that this amendment ought to be put in this bill, especially when it will not cost the Government a cent. The money is appropriated for this purpose and will be spent. But the school authorities are compelled to take the least experienced teachers, who are getting small salaries and have the least experience, to do normal-school work, which is ridiculous and was never intended by Congress. Of course, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] wishes this state of affairs to continue, he can insist upon his point of order. But I assure you that he is saving no money and is simply making it impossible to get the best teachers, even though in the summer and night school pay the very best teachers are excluded by him when they would receive no more pay than the experienced ones. He simply does the school work injury and does not save a penny.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 6. That section 5 of the act of June 22, 1906, prohibiting the transfer of employees from one executive department to another shall apply with equal force and effect to the transfer of employees from executive departments to independent establishments and vice versa and to the transfer of employees from one independent establishment to another: Provided, That the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be considered a Government establishment for the purposes of this section.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that section for the purpose of giving the chairman of the committee an opportunity to explain the reason for the legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The existing statute prevents these transfers of employees from executive departments. This provision extends it to cover the independent services which are not executive departments.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If these transfers are made, then, these new departments will be filled just as the head of the department sees fit to fill them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee is attempting to correct what has developed into a very grave abuse. To provide the necessary employees because of this war situation it is necessary to provide large lump-sum appropriations to pay them. Investigation disclosed that it is proposed in some services to utilize the money intended for additional employees to increase compensations very extensively of the existing organizations, and then the situation developed where the various governmental services commenced to bid against one another for the services of some particular individual. An instance was called to our attention when in a period of about two months one employee who was in the Government service at $1,800 a year had two transfers and is now getting $4,000 a year. It seems to the committee that when Congress was providing in a very liberal manner for the additional employees needed to conduct the Government that there should not be permitted abuses of that kind, and that provision should be made in order to prevent a system under which one of the grossest kinds of favoritism could possibly exist.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That no civil employee in any of the executive departments or other Government establishments, or who has been employed therein within the period of one year next preceding his proposed employment in any other executive department or other Government establishment, shall be employed hereafter and paid from a lump-sum appropriation in any other executive department or other Government establishment at an increased rate of compensation. And no civil employee in any of the executive departments or other Government establishments or who has been employed therein within the period of one year next preceding his proposed employment in any other executive department or other Government establishment and who may be employed in another executive department or other Government establishment shall be granted an increase in compensation within the period of one year following such reemployment: Provided, That the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be considered a Government establishment for the purposes of this section: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to repeal section 5 of the act of June 22, 1906, which prohibits the transfer of employees from one department to another.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment as a new section.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois to offer an amendment which he has sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I was attempting to obtain recognition of the Chair.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman was on his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman might be on his feet, but the Chair will state that gentlemen are on their feet all the time in the Hall, and unless the gentleman addresses the Chair the Chair could not recognize him. The Chair desires to be fair to all the Members of the House and has no disposition to hold that the point of order comes too late, and unless there is some one who does, the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I addressed the Chair. I did not know what more I could do unless I came up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not address the Chair sufficiently loud to be heard by the Chair. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation, is extraneous to the purposes of the bill, and is not germane. I withhold my point of order temporarily if the gentleman from Illinois desires to be heard on his amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to explain what this section does, and to hope the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order. The purpose of this provision is to prevent the very great abuse I have pointed out. Employees of these departments who are in positions at fixed statutory salaries have been taken out of those positions and transferred to other departments at an increased compensation, and in some instances have been transferred a second time with another increase of compensation, and then transferred a third time with an increase of compensation. What the committee has endeavored to do is to prevent a situation existing under which the grossest favoritism can be shown and the grossest abuse in expenditure of money which is provided for the temporary needs of the Government. As I have already stated, Congress very liberally has provided lump sums of money in very large amounts to enable the department to obtain the additional employees required, and when it is found that with these funds available men are taken out of positions with a fixed salary and simply put on the roll on these lump sums in order to increase their compensation without any resulting benefit to the Government, it is an abuse which should not be tolerated. Now, if this proposition were coming from members of the minority of this House it might be suspected that some one had endeavored to hamper the administration in their work. This proposition originated with me as the result of an investigation which the Committee on Appropriations has made. [Applause.] I have no desire to hamper this administration. I have done everything in my power to help it, but I am unwilling for either a Democratic or Republican administration to have the power and to exercise the power to such an extent in such an abusive manner as has been disclosed before the committee. [Applause.] A member of the Cabinet came to me and asked to have such a provision put in this bill. He told us that the representatives of other departments had been approaching men who were content in his department and endeavoring to take them away from him with an increased compensation over what it would be possible for him to offer under the law. That should not be permitted. Men in executive departments are human and if we do not at this time put in this provision and stop this competition among the various services of the Government for the services of employees, within a very short time the Members of this House will be rising up in the greatest indignation on account of scandals that are bound to result. I hope the gentleman will not, under these circumstances, interfere with this provision.

Here is the Emergency Fleet Corporation. We are proposing to put at its disposal $1,900,000,000 without any restriction whatever upon what they can do in the way of paying compensation. The Bureau of Lighthouses, with a trained technical force necessary in the conduct of its work, has had every draftsman taken out of that bureau into other service, where they are paid larger compensation, under lump appropriations. The office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, probably the most important office of the country at this time from the standpoint of safeguarding the public funds, has had experienced men, trained in that work, law clerks, taken out of his office by other departments offering inducements and paying them higher compensation. If these provisions are not incorporated the whole Government service will be so completely demoralized that it will be a disgrace to the country.

We have been talking about a committee to supervise expenditures. This is a character of work Congress ought to do, namely, that when we find the possibility of abuse, to place restrictions upon the expenditure of the money and curtail the action of the executive department in that manner. But it is idle to talk about controlling them if we find a situation that demands the remedy and we fail to exercise our power to correct the abuse.

I hope the gentleman will not, in view of the statement I have made, insist upon his question of order. There is another way of reaching it, but only temporarily, in a manner that will be in order. I can offer this amendment so as to apply only to the appropriations contained in this bill, but that will only partly cure the abuse, because of the appropriations that were made in the first deficiency bill and other preceding appropriation acts. This is a matter that there was no controversy over. As soon as the facts were disclosed and the Members ascertained what was happening, and realized the possibilities of what might occur, without any difference of opinion of men because of difference in political faith, but in the best interests of the Government service, this provision was agreed upon. And to insist that it be eliminated from this bill because it proposes legislation is to nullify, to a very considerable extent, the result of the labors of the Committee on Appropriations during the eight weeks of the summer months, when other Members were able to leave the city in order to take needed, necessary, and proper recreation.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, of course that does not apply to me, because I have been here ever since last November.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say that it applied to the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Well, inferentially.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman may have had as equally laborious tasks imposed upon him as the members of the committee that framed this bill have had.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not in his opinion section 5 of the act that was passed in 1906 is not sufficient to cover the purpose as intended in this section?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not. And that is why it was necessary to provide a new law. Section 5 provided that it should be unlawful hereafter for any clerk or other employee in the classified service in any of the Government departments to be transferred from one department to another department without such clerk or other employee should have served a term of three years in the department from which he desired to be transferred. And what is done now is that the clerk or employee to be transferred gets the classified status which would make him eligible to be taken into a different service, and he resigns the position he has and is taken in as a new employee; and in that way evades the law designed by Congress to prevent that abuse.

If we were at a time now where we were proposing to organize and build up a service, there might be a different situation. But we are to take on a force of temporary employees, and to use the money provided for that purpose to increase compensation is absolutely indefensible and it ought to result in remedial legislation.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I am not attempting to hamper the administration; on the contrary, I have voted to sustain its recommendations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this proposition might very properly have originated on the minority side of the House. There is nothing that might permit a more unjust action than the existing situation.

To permit executive officials to be in a position to single out men or employees for some special reason—and of course some one may be interested—and give them increased compensation for doing practically the same duties out of sums provided to enable the departments to get additional employees is an abuse that should not be possible.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Why do you place the limitation at one year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because it is possible that persons have been employed in the Government service in the past whose services would be highly desirable, and they might wish to be recalled into the service; and anybody who has been out of the service more than a year, if he is called in, would not be for the purpose merely of increasing his compensation.

For instance, I can call attention to a case that is a very important one. The War Department, of course, has had an enormous burden of work placed upon it. The office of the Secretary has had a volume of business imposed on it that has made it absolutely impossible for the regular force to handle it, and it had to be very greatly extended. Now, if it were possible in the Secretary's office to obtain the services of some one who had been in that office before and was familiar with the departmental work it would be of immense service. The Secretary of War was able to employ in the office of the Secretary, according to my recollection, a man who had been in the office in a previous administration. That is a case of attempting to seek a qualified man and taking him in. But as to some one who has been in the service of the Government during this past year there is no special reason at this time to permit him to be taken in and his compensation increased out of a lump appropriation.

Mr. BORLAND. I will suggest to the chairman also that one year is the limitation during which an employee can be taken back into the civil service after he has been out of it. After he has been out of the civil service one year he is not eligible to reinstatement.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I will say to the chairman that my real objection to the provisions of this section is directed to the provision "or other Government establishments." You make a blanket proposition here that covers everything.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a reason for that.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I would like to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The expression "executive departments" covers only the regular departments, such as the Department of State, the Post Office Department, the War Department, the Navy Department, and so on. The Library of Congress, for instance, is not in an executive department, but is an independent Government establishment.

Mr. MADDEN. The Interstate Commerce is not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the Interstate Commerce Commission is not; so that in order to cover this situation it is necessary to use language that will reach them. If the expression "executive departments" covered all these governmental activities it would be all right, but it does not cover them. The Interstate Commerce Commission, the Alaska Railway Commission, Commission on the Physical Valuation of Railroads—

Mr. MADDEN. The Federal Trade Commission—

Mr. GILLET. The Civil Service Commission—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and there is the Federal Farm Loan Board and a hundred and one other independent governmental activities that are not under any regular executive department of the Government. It would be unfair to have this law apply only to employees of the regular departments and leave all the others out. That is the reason why that expression was used.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I will say to the chairman of the committee that frequently the Post Office appropriation bill comes in and various other appropriation bills come in, and hitched onto the tail end of nearly every one of them is some provision that is absolutely extraneous to the subject matter of the measure. Nobody outside has ever had any notice of its presentation to Congress or opportunity to be heard on it; the first notice of its being in the bill appears when the measure itself appears on the desk here for consideration. That does not appeal to me as a fair way to legislate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true; but I think it can be said of the Committee on Appropriations, however, that in the great bulk of instances the legislation that it recommends on appropriation bills is legislation designed either to improve the efficiency of the service or to eliminate abuses which the investigations of the committee have disclosed exist. There is no other method by which the remedial legislation can be proposed, and all the restrictive legislation which eliminates or corrects abuses in the conduct of the executive departments and which is quite unpopular and severely condemned in the departments originates in the Committee on Appropriations and is enacted and carried on appropriation bills, because it is there alone that the information is obtained which discloses the necessity for such legislation.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Yes; but I will say this to the chairman: This is the only way I could reach the proposition. It could not be considered on its merits. At the present time in some of the departments of the Government they have an unwritten or written rule, which I understand is actually in force, that precludes any Government employee from complaining to anybody except his superior officer of anything concerning his surroundings, including his salary. I have had that particularly brought to my attention. They can not come directly and complain of their surroundings or the salary they are getting; and under this provision, if they should become dissatisfied and want to be transferred, it might be agreeable to the supervisor or the chief of their division to make the transfer, but if this provision goes through they can not make the transfer even if it is agreeable to both departments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know the rule to which the gentleman refers. My constituents come to me with their grievances, and when they do I present them to the departments. Congress passed a few years ago what is known as the "anti-tag law," and I had supposed there were no complaints of that matter. I have not heard of any. Of course, no general provision can be drawn to effect a situation that will not work injustice in individual cases. What it is designed to accomplish, however, is to prevent that which will grow into a very grave abuse.

Now, I have found by investigation that both in Germany and in Great Britain one of the things about which the most serious complaint is made at this time is the alleged unnecessary multiplication of government employees.

No matter how careful Congress is, it can not keep the number of employees within the strict number that may be required, but we can prevent some of the other abuses that will result from this very large increase in the force, and that is to eliminate the abuses of favoritism and improprieties that can exist and which have occurred, in my opinion, because there was no restrictive legislation.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's statement, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, add a new section as follows:

"Sec. 7a. That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for increased compensation at the rate of 20 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate per annum less than $1,200, for increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at the rate of not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, and for increased compensation at the rate of 5 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate not more than $2,400 per annum and not less than $1,800 per annum, so much as may be necessary is appropriated."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to the amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, this is really an amendment to section 7 of the act of March 3, 1917. In that act we provided an increase of 5 to 10 per cent for Government employees, and I am trying to amend it by increasing it to 20, 10, and 5 per cent.

I believe it is in order because it is not new legislation, but merely an amendment to the present law.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It changes existing law, does it not?

Mr. SABATH. It increases the compensation of the underpaid employees. I hope the gentleman does not contend that any proposition for increased compensation of employees is always out of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It changes existing law?

Mr. SABATH. In so far that it will provide a higher compensation for the employees of the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair rules, I wish to state that when the 5 and 10 per cent increase was before the House last session it thrashed out the question of whether the increase should be 5 and 10 per cent or 10 and 20 per cent. That question was then settled. In my opinion, this is not the time to start in and double the increased compensation which was determined upon at that time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make this observation—

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that it was estimated the proposed provision would add about $50,000,000 to the bill.

Mr. SABATH. In view of the billions we have been appropriating for the last few days, it would not amount to very much.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is no reason why we should add forty or fifty million dollars to this.

Mr. SABATH. That is not the reason why I offer the amendment. It was early in March this year, before the declaration of war, when we increased the wages 5 and 10 per cent. I was then endeavoring to secure an increase of 10 and 20 per cent. Since that time we have had a declaration of war, and, due to other reasons and other causes, instead of the price of necessities being reduced they have steadily increased. I was in hopes that the new food administrator would bring about a reduction in the high cost of living; so far I have not seen any favorable result. It seems to me that the only thing I have been able to observe was that the prices have been guaranteed to the farmer and prices to the consumer have increased. I noticed only in this morning's paper that they have agreed on the price of potatoes at $1.50 a bushel. What applies to potatoes applies to nearly all the necessities of life. It is in view of these tremendously high prices of the necessities of life that I have introduced this amendment, believing that it is impossible for people to make both ends meet at the present compensation they are now receiving.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. If the gentleman will allow me, wheat has been reduced practically a dollar a bushel since the advent of the food administrator.

Mr. SABATH. The price of wheat has been reduced to some extent from the unreasonable, unjustifiable, gambling-made price of some time ago; in fact, from the 15th of May, on which day I introduced a resolution prohibiting gambling in food products, and the simultaneous restricting of that practice on the Chicago Board of Trade, was, in a great measure, responsible for the reduction. I believe that the price which has been fixed for wheat is too high, because I feel satisfied that $1.50 or $1.75 would have been a fair price for wheat. [Applause.] I believe that the price of potatoes at $1.50 a bushel is also altogether too high. [Applause.] I have no objection to the farmer receiving a fair price for his product, but I am opposed and protest against the unreasonable high prices that are being forced upon us. I do not believe that the laboring people residing in the large centers should be held up and be forced to pay these unjustifiably high prices that now prevail; and I sincerely hope that Mr. Hoover will not only have in mind the protection of the farmer but also the consumer. I realize that he has before him a hard task, but the power given him is so broad that it should enable him to bring about the relief which was in the minds of the President and the Congress when the legislation was enacted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Under the statement of the gentleman from Illinois he admits that he seeks to amend existing law by adding new legislation, giving an increase to those that are not now by law entitled to it. The conclusion can not be escaped that it is legislation, and changes existing law, which is not in order on an appropriation bill. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to say that in my judgment the provisions of this section are among the best provisions of this bill. Much criticism, and just criticism, has been made on the floor of the House during the past few weeks relative to the desire and the attempts of great commercial interests of the country to make excessive profits out of the present war. However, it can not be fairly said that the great business interests or the multimillionaires of the country are the only ones subject to criticism in this respect. To the least observant it is most evident that an insatiable greed is prevalent throughout the country on the part of a certain class of labor agitators to gouge the Government for higher wages. I noted in the Washington Post of yesterday morning an item to the effect that 2,400 union employees in the shipyards of San Francisco had struck for higher wages. I am advised that on the Pacific coast to-day they are paying in the shipyards for ordinary skilled labor $8 a day for an eight-hour day, and I am advised that similar and as efficient skilled labor is being employed in foreign countries, like in Japan, for $2.40 a day.

I observe in this same paper which I hold in my hand, and I ask that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting these articles in the Record, an account of the meeting in this city of Federal employees from all parts of the country, convened for the purpose of effecting the organization of a national Federal employees' union. It is very patent upon its face that the real purpose of this national organization is in the end to gouge the Government out of higher wages for its members. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] said that he was under the impression that Federal employees were not permitted to make complaint of their working conditions or of the wages paid to them. During the time that I have been in Congress I have not observed anything of that kind. On the contrary, I have personally found whenever any of my constituents who were in the Government employ have had anything to complain of or when any of them even imagined there was a ground for complaint they have not hesitated to write or to speak to me concerning their grievances.

I have seen on several different occasions Government employees gathered here in the galleries of this House like flocks of blackbirds in a ripening field of grain to urge the enactment of legislation being considered by the House for the further increase of their wages and for the further shortening of their already short hours of labor. I have seen them here in droves lobbying for grossly excessive wages, as compared with those wages paid for like employment in private industries throughout the country. The fact that present legislation permits the head of a bureau or department to raise the wages of some particularly favored employee simply because the head of the bureau or department has a lump-sum appropriation into which he may grab without any restriction or restraint, and the fact that this privilege and freedom given to the heads of bureaus and departments during this war emergency has been grossly abused calls loudly for this legislation and calls for it at once. I for one am pleased that no point of order has been made against this meritorious new legislation, and I trust that it will soon be incorporated into law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to reprint these articles to which he has alluded in his extension of remarks?

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman that I desire to call to the attention of the House and to the country—particularly to the country—these articles, so that the country may know the fact of the unreasonable demands for higher wages that are being made during this war by certain classes of men employed in the Government service, and so that the country may know of the work that is being done, and of the men who are doing it, to organize a national Federal employees' union. When farm laborers and when the farmers of this country are asked—and, in fact, compelled by law—to take for their products less than the cost of production they are entitled to know what is taking place along other lines in this Nation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to comment upon the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. I do not think any impression ought to go out from this floor unanswered that the Government employees in the city of Washington are underpaid. The gentleman ought to compare the salaries paid to Government employees in the city of Washington with the commercial salaries paid in the great city of Chicago, and he would arrive at a very good notion as to whether the Government employees in the city of Washington are underpaid.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a minute.

Mr. SABATH. I did not have reference merely to employees in the city of Washington, but to all Government employees.

Mr. BORLAND. I am going to answer the gentleman upon that, but before I do so I want to call attention also to the fact that if he will compare the scale of prices paid by the Government in the city of Washington with that paid by the Southern Railroad in its general offices, with the American Federation of Labor in its general offices, or any other institution in its general offices here that has a force of employees, he will find that the Government employees are not underpaid according to the scale in the city of Washington. This 5 and 10 per cent increase, I am sorry to say, after all the dust that was kicked up on the floor of the House, in the last analysis applies only to the employees in the city of Washington. There is no provision extending that 5 per cent and 10 per cent increase to the great army of postal employees and others throughout the United States, and to-day the customhouse custodians and other men of that kind are still complaining that they are at great disadvantage as compared with the employees in the city of Washington.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, they get it. Every employee within the classified service comes within the 5 and 10 per cent clause except those provided for in the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. SABATH. Whether in Washington or any other city?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Everywhere.

Mr. BORLAND. I know that the postal employees do not get it. With regard to the question of the underpaid employees in the District of Columbia, I was down town recently talking to a merchant whom I have known for a great many years—a very shrewd merchant, too. I asked him whether anyone in the District of Columbia was economizing this year, and he said no. He said, "Mr. BORLAND, they are not. Last spring, when war broke out, I was in grave doubt whether to order a stock of goods, because I saw that prices were going to be so high in comparison with the ordinary prices that I doubted whether people would buy the goods, and I thought they would be left on my shelves. I therefore ordered much less than I ought to have ordered. The fact is that the well-to-do people and the people to whom I ordinarily sell my better class of goods are not buying them; they are doing without. But," he said, "the working girls are coming in here and buying without asking the price." He said, "I have never seen such a condition before," and he said, "I am selling more goods of the better class to the employees of the Government than I ever sold to the well-to-do people of Washington." I do not comment upon the question of how a lady should dress or how handsomely she should provide for her clothing. Nobody likes to see ladies better dressed than I do [applause], but I do comment upon it as showing to the country and to the outside cities that there are no underpaid clerks in the Government employ in Washington. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That in determining the right of employees to increased compensation as heretofore authorized by law at rates of 5 and 10 per cent per annum for the fiscal year 1918, such employees as are employed on piecework, by the hour, or at per diem rates shall be entitled to receive, from July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918, inclusive, the increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent when the fixed rate of compensation for the regular working hours and on the basis of 312 days in said year would amount to less than $1,200, and at the rate of 5 per cent when not less than $1,200 and not more than $1,800: Provided, That this method of compensation shall not apply to any per diem employees regularly paid a per diem for every day in the year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 76, line 14, strike out the word "compensation" and insert in lieu thereof the word "computation."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, now that we are about to vote upon a bill appropriating nearly $5,000,000,000 and providing for appropriations and authorizations of more than $7,000,000,000, it is perhaps well to emphasize the fact that while this bill will be passed unanimously, it is true that as members of the committee who reported the bill or as Members of the House we can not under the circumstances, and we do not, feel absolutely certain that all of these great sums are needed or required. I think ordinarily in reporting an appropriation bill in times of peace the committee reporting it and its members are reasonably certain and satisfied that the amounts carried in the bill are necessary and essential for the purposes for which they are provided; but we can not have any such assurance in times like these. As a matter of fact, we have but one fixed policy in the matter of appropriations, and that is the policy of winning this war. That being the case, we must resolve every doubt we have with regard to the necessity of appropriations, with regard to the amount of appropriations, in favor of the opinion of those charged with responsibility as to the amount of money that is necessary for the various purposes. I am of the opinion that even the officials who make the estimates, the officers who appear before the committees, do not, can not, under present conditions, know definitely or have better than a reasonably sound opinion as to the amounts which may be necessary for each or any one of these purposes for which we are asked to appropriate. They are taking no chances, I assume, by asking for smaller sums than may be needed, and we can not afford to deny the appropriations asked when backed by statements based on the judgment of those who are to expend the money that the sums asked are necessary. When we go home to our constituents some of them may be inclined to criticize the very great appropriations we have made. We can not truthfully meet such a criticism with the statement that we knew or that we had sound reasons for believing that the sums appropriated were all necessary. We can, however, meet any such criticism with the statement that we are giving our country and the administration the benefit of the doubt. We can defend our action on the ground that we can not afford to withhold any sum that may be needed, and that therefore, although these sums seem to be very great, although some of them are possibly larger than will be necessary, some of them beyond the amount that will be actually expended, the Congress is justified, in fact it is the duty of the Congress, to meet every request presented with reasonable argument by the officials of the administration. We are in this conflict to win and the Congress will not withhold a dollar necessary for that purpose, although the sums asked for and provided are stupendous beyond all precedent. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may renumber the sections, one section having been stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5949, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed unanimously. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL BONDS.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 5901, the bond bill, be taken from the Speaker's table, that the Senate amendments be disagreed to, and the conference asked for by the Senate be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5901, the bond bill, to disagree to all Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, are there many amendments to the bill?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. There are only two or three of any importance, and they are of minor importance, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. Why does not the gentleman move to concur, then?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That was suggested, but on account of the disposition of certain Members who have examined one or two of the amendments in detail, that course was abandoned.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to see what the amendments are that are in question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill has been printed with amendments. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, and has been available to Members to-day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the only essential amendment is not the one which increases the amount of money which the Secretary of War may spend in financing the bonds?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I think that is the only amendment about which there is any controversy.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to the amendment just referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] authorizing additional moneys that may be at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury in the disposition of these bonds and certificates. That in effect is the only substantial amendment that has been put on in the Senate.

Mr. MADDEN. That amounts to $6,000,000 more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The increase is from one-seventh to one-fourth of 1 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. The original House bill was one-fifth, and the Senate has, so far as the bond and war certificates are concerned, authorized the expenditure of one-fourth. As to certificates of indebtedness, the Senate has reduced it from one-tenth, as authorized by the House, to one-twentieth.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. HULL of Tennessee, Mr. GARNER, and Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mean to intimate there will be nothing for the House to do until Friday?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Some few delegations, I think, will be called home to-morrow in connection with the primary election; and I understand that the conferees on the revenue bill will not be ready to report progress before Friday. And in view of the necessary absence of quite a large portion of the membership, it was thought advisable to adjourn until Friday. No business will be transacted until that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ANNEX TO TREASURY BUILDING.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 2477, a bill to construct an annex to the Treasury Building.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 2477, to build an annex to the Treasury Building. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], who is representing the majority leader. I was informed that if we adjourned to-day over until Friday that we would adjourn from Friday over until Monday. There are a good many bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that were necessarily put over by reason of the pressing consideration of the war deficiency bill that has just been considered. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he has any authority to say that we will not transact any business on Friday of this week when we meet?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I am not advised as to that, I will say to the gentleman, by the floor leader. I only know this, that it is a matter of great urgency to dispose of the conference report on both the bond bill and the revenue bill, and probably each of those reports will be forthcoming on Friday.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not dispose of them the day the reports come in.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. We can undertake to make such progress as we can.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are a great number of Members out of the city at present, and more would leave the city if there were no business to be taken up on Friday. I would like to know if it is possible to enter into a unanimous consent, with the approval of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET], as I understand, that is the understanding he had with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], to adjourn from Friday to next Monday or Tuesday and not to take up any business on Friday. I will say that I had a talk with the gentleman from Massachusetts, in company with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and he was of the opinion at that time that it could be arranged.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I trust the gentleman will not do that now, in view of my limited knowledge of the intentions of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are a great many bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. This bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. We should not play favorites in the consideration of any of these bills, and I think there should be some day set when we could consider the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. McARTHUR. Do these unanimous-consent bills refer to war?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is there a bill pending?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. I will withdraw my point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think there should be some agreement as to taking up bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar instead of considering them piecemeal.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. We want to deal with conference reports on Friday.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman ask unanimous consent to do that; that next Monday be taken up with bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. There are a few bills on that calendar—not great bills, but bills that ought to be passed now.

Mr. MADDEN. The revenue bill will be taken up on Monday.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not to interfere with conference reports and privileged business.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like to see if we can not agree upon some day—I tried the other day—to be set apart as unanimous-consent day in lieu of yesterday. It does seem to me we ought not to ignore these bills on the calendar. We have time now to consider them, and why should we not do it?

Mr. MADDEN. We could agree, say, on next Tuesday, to take up the consideration of these conference reports, including that on the revenue bill, and immediately after the disposition of those we could fix upon a day for the consideration of Unanimous Consent Calendar bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that all this discussion is out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do that if he wants to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask unanimous consent that next Monday be set apart as unanimous-consent day in lieu of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Does that request embrace shoving out of the way conference reports?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not at all.

Mr. GILLET. It should be subject, it seems to me, to all privileged business.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent that next Monday—

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Some gentlemen near me suggest Tuesday—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that on next Tuesday bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be considered, not to interfere with conference reports, privileged matters, and matters on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if that could be coupled with a unanimous-consent agreement that the conference reports from the Ways and Means Committee should not be considered on Monday, I would not object. A number of Members want to go away on Monday, and—

The SPEAKER. This request does not cut out the consideration of the revenue bill.

Mr. MADDEN. But it cuts out an opportunity for those who want to go away and who want to consider the revenue bill if it should come up on Monday.

Mr. FOSTER. You can not tell about that now.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I will object to all unanimous-consent requests until that matter is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object to all unanimous-consent requests until that is arranged.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if we can not have unanimous consent as to other bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, I shall object to having them taken up piecemeal.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objects.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this measure is of great public importance. I ask leave to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This is not a private bill. It is a matter of great public importance, to provide room for the Treasury Department, so that it can discharge its functions.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that I think there are other bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that are more important than this one.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin object?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman recall that motion?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No.
